The newspaper provided its readers with the first reference to Germany's genocidal policy in a piece published on April 1, 1942. "The Nazis Are pursuing a policy of systematized extermination in Poland, Czechoslovakia, Serbia and elsewhere," the story declared.

"Thousands of Jews have been slaughtered this year in Bessarabia and the whole of Rumania is, so far as the Jews are concerned, a concentration camp. The 90,000 Jews that remain in Czechoslovakia are soon to be rounded up… Events are becoming tense in Bulgaria… From Holland has come the report that 4,000 Jewish youth were 'worked to death' at dangerous forced-labour camps by the Nazis."

Through 1942, the Star published stories about the use of Jewish slave workers in Bulgaria, deportations from Germany, Holland and Slovakia, the ghettoization of Polish Jews and the mass murder of Jews in the Baltic states and Poland.

The Star published its most detailed account of Nazi mass murder on Dec. 24 1942: "The anti-Jewish activities… have now grown to systematic murder on a mass scale… Almost 2,000,000 Jews in Europe have been slain since the war began. Another 5,000,000 are scheduled for destruction."

In a reference to Nazi death camps such as Auschwitz and Majdanek, the newspaper said, "Poland appears to be the main 'slaughter depot' to which Jews from all over Europe are being shipped."

Frisse writes, "By the end of 1942, despite the overall unsystematic and fragmentary coverage of events, Star readers knew of the European scope of the deportations and killings, the central role that Poland played as the destination of the deportations and the place of mass exterminations, the collaboration of people in the Baltic states in the extermination of their Jewish populations, as well as the main methods of killing applied by the Germans."

Throughout 1943, articles carried by the Star made explicit references to the Treblinka, Belzec and Sobibor death camps. Yet it mentioned the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising only in passing.

In conclusion, Frisse says the paper's "main shortcoming" in its coverage of the Nazi era was its "lack of consistency." Some stories, such as the September 1941 Babi Yar massacre in Kiev, were published only years after the fact.

Nonetheless, the Star's coverage was superior to that of other Canadian newspapers, Frisse told The CJN.

He closes his piece with a resounding moral judgment: "In relation to Canada's role as a passive bystander to the Holocaust, the Canadian government's unwillingness to come to the aid of the Jews of Europe is not a reflection of lack of knowledge. The decision not to take action was not made because of lack of information, but in spite of information that as early as 1942 pointed toward the existence of a comprehensive plan to destroy the Jews of Europe – the Final Solution."

STRATFORD ACTOR IS DEDICATED TO THE STAGE

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

For Ian Lake, a young actor who has dabbled with television roles, his real passion is for the stage.

In his fourth season at the Stratford Festival, 28-year-old Vancouver native Lake said that acting has been a huge part of his life for the last decade.

"I had parents who were very appreciative of the arts and would always bring me out to shows and made it an important part of my upbringing, but it wasn't until I went to university when I was 18 that I really took a more serious approach and started to consider it as a career choice," said Lake, who plays Joey in Nobel laureate Harold Pinter's The Homecoming.

"Joey is the youngest of three brothers. He's a boxer, and it's a family where everyone is like a pack of wolves, and there is a real fight over territory in this family," Lake said, explaining the character he plays.

"It's not the friendliest family... Joey is really quite an innocent. He doesn't really engage so much in verbal sparring, because I don't think he has the mental ability to do it. He feels like if he leaves well enough alone, nobody will come after him. He's a boxer, a construction worker, he likes to chase women and eat food, and that is his world. He doesn't speak very much, he speaks with his body language more than anything and it's a really fun character to play."

Ian Lake

Lake, who is also part of the ensemble cast in Shakespeare's Twelfth Night, said that his role in The Homecoming was the first one in his acting career that inspired him to prepare extensively, by training for months at a boxing ring.

"This is the first time I have really taken on such extensive preparation for a part," he said.

Lake has a number of sought-after Shakespeare roles under his belt, including Silvius in As You Like It, Florizel in The Winter's Tale and Demetrius in A Midsummer Night's Dream, but this past winter was the first time he was able to land a role to which he felt a personal connection.

"For the first time, I had a chance to play a Jewish role," said Lake, who described his upbringing as secular, but his family was a part of a "network of several Jewish families," who were members of the Peretz Centre for Secular Jewish Culture in Vancouver.

He said his first and only Jewish role came when he was working at Theatre Aquarius in Hamilton, Ont.

"There is a play called For This Moment Alone, which is a talmudic reference that when you do a mitzvah, God looks down and says, 'for this moment alone it was worth creating the world,'" Lake explained.

The play – by Canadian playwright Marcia Kash, who borrowed heavily from her own family history to tell this story – was set in Toronto in 1948 and is about a Holocaust survivor who deceives a family of survivors that settled in Canada.

Lake's character, a survivor named Freddy, pretends to be a relative of the family so they will sponsor him for immigration to get him out of a displaced person's camp.

"This was the first time that I played a part that meant so much to my history and my family's history, and it wasn't just about it being an emotional story. It was actually something that mattered to me," Lake said.

He said even though he was never pushed into roles that have Jewish themes, he felt that this role honoured his family in some way.

Although his own family didn't suffer through the Holocaust firsthand, as his grandparents were born in Canada, "for my grandmother, [teaching about] the Holocaust is one of her reasons for being."

Lake said his grandmother, who once served as the director of the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre, used to take him on tours of the centre.

Ian Lake, centre, as Joey in The Homecoming.

"I remember... being affected quite strongly by that."

But it was his recent trip to Israel on a Birthright Israel tour that helped make this role more meaningful for him.

"Going to Israel gave me a stronger sense of what it means to be a Jew. Leaving Vancouver, I felt disconnected from that part of my life, because I work in Stratford, where there are so few Jewish people – there are only a handful of us, and we get together for Holidays, and every now and then, someone will have a Shabbat dinner. There's about six of us in the whole company of 100 actors."

He said his trip to Israel helped him play the part of Freddy better.

Lake said his trip also helped him solidify his convictions and seek roles that mesh well with his ideals.

"If there is a story that conflicts with my ideals, it's important for me to have an opinion about that and have the opportunity to say, 'That isn't something I'm interested in doing...' Going to Israel was part of me beginning to understand exactly what my ideals are," he said.

Although much of Lake's acting experience comes from his time on the stage, he has recently landed a television role on the CTV drama Flashpoint.

"That was my first foray into television and it was a lot of fun... [But] my real passion is for the stage," said Lake, who trained at the National Theatre School of Canada and at the Birmingham Conservatory for Classical Theatre.

"I've been very fortunate to work at Stratford and to work on some big stages and get to play some really phenomenal parts," he said, adding that there is nothing like performing on stage.

"Here at Stratford we have some pretty big theatres where you can get about 2,000 people in a room. It's pretty special to get the chance to go up there and perform in front of that many people, especially when the plays we get to do here are such wonderful plays."

He said although he wants to put more of an effort into landing more television gigs, "I think my heart will always belong on the stage in theatre."

It's out of your hands

Dear Ella,

I play mah-jong with the same group of women every week. We've been playing together for many years and have become close friends. Janice, one of the members of the group, was just diagnosed with breast cancer. She told us all individually. She said she didn't want the mood or the conversations at our games to change. We often talk about life situations when we get together – anything from shopping to rotten kids and everything in between. We know we need to respect Janice's wishes not to discuss her health at our games.

Ruthie, one of the other women, does and says whatever she wants. No matter what's going on, Ruthie manages to twist it around and only see how it affects her. She dominates the conversation with her problems week after week. She is a good person, but a little hard to take.

We were all shocked when at our last game, she brought up how difficult it was when her aunt had cancer and how it turned the whole family upside down. I wanted to reach across the table and duct tape her mouth shut. Janice excused herself early, claiming she had a headache.

Talking to Ruthie and letting her know will only have an effect for a short time, because she doesn't really hear any kind of criticism. You can see in her eyes that she isn't listening. What should we do? It was a very uncomfortable evening for all of us.

Sad Mahj Member

Dear Sad Mahj Member,

No one has control over the personalities of others. They say that "it takes all kinds" to make the world interesting, but it's unfortunate that Ruthie lacks the sensitivity that's so needed here.

Janice has a battle ahead of her, and she wanted to use your weekly mah-jong games as an escape. Since you're all close, Janice knows what kind of person Ruthie is, so her little story about her aunt probably wasn't a surprise.

There are a few things you can do. Start by bringing it to Ruthie's attention. She's so self-absorbed that she didn't have a clue how her story affected her friend. I'm sure she didn't tell the story out of malice. She just can't see past her own life. People like Ruthie suck the energy out of those around them. They cause a lot of eye rolling and thoughts of "here we go again."

Since no one can really control Ruthie's mouth, you may experience some uncomfortable moments at your games in the future. You can try to jump in and change the subject or try handling the situation with humour. A funny line hurts less than an embarrassing serious moment.

Maybe Ruthie will pick up on what your are doing and stop, but she may be so far gone that she won't even realize what's happening.

At the end of the day, it will all be up to Janice. If having a place to escape to is important to her, she will have to sit down and have a talk with Ruthie and lay down some ground rules. You can only go so far to create that comfortable place for Janice to escape to.

It's times like this that really test the bonds of friendship.

The limits of information

It was another of my favourite activities – an ethics seminar with a group of health-care professionals who work in the geriatric department of a large Tel Aviv hospital.

Whenever I am in Israel, we meet to discuss a specific clinical case in which the staff is confronted with difficult ethical decisions, and we use the opportunity to talk about principles and approaches. With the requisite coffee, strudel and good humour, it is always an uplifting experience for me and gives me a chance to use my fractured Hebrew – which usually ends up with us collectively speaking "Heblish."

The case we discussed could just as well have been from Canada: an older man living at home with severe dementia looked after primarily by his wife with the assistance of a personal-care worker. His two daughters helped with his care, and during the discussion it became clear that although they were not the legal substitute decision-makers, they seemed to be taking over that role from their mother, without her necessarily agreeing with their views.

The 92-year-old patient had been brought to emergency because of sudden onset back pain without any history of trauma. He was admitted to the geriatric unit, and tests revealed severe osteoporosis and a compression fracture of a lower vertebra. Another finding was a small tumour-like lung nodule that, from the X-ray, could not be determined as either benign or malignant. His significant dementia prevented his participation in discussions, but he was still able to eat and, with help, use the lavatory.

Senior Side of Life

Michael Gordon

The daughters were pressuring the physicians to determine the "cause" of his back pain and nature of the lung lesion. The staff was reluctant to expose the patient to invasive investigations as those non-invasive ones already done (scans, CT scan, blood work) had not revealed further information. There was no one on the medical staff who thought that more tests would likely add to their ability to treat him, other than for symptom control. But they did think that determining whether the nodule in his lung was malignant, through bronchoscopy or needle biopsy, could lead to serious adverse reactions and was unlikely to prolong his life or comfort.

The daughters, despite their mother's expressed reluctance, were pressing the doctors for "more information" to "know exactly" what was wrong with their father. The wife was reluctant to get into conflict with her children, but seemed to understand better the status of her husband with whom she lived, while her devoted daughters only visited, although regularly.

At the end of the team discussion with me, after exploring all the points, it was decided to ask the daughters what they thought more information would provide for their father, who was already on the steep trajectory slope of decline from dementia, which they clearly did not understand has a terminal phase. We agreed to stress to them the reality of his dementia illness and that his comfort during the limited period of life he had should be the focus now, rather than exposing him to the potentially negative impact of modern technological medicine.

I suggested that the team emphasize to the daughters, in a loving and supportive fashion, the limits of "more information," when what their father needed at this point was love and devotion and a focus on comfort rather than a "diagnosis" that was unlikely to add much to his life.

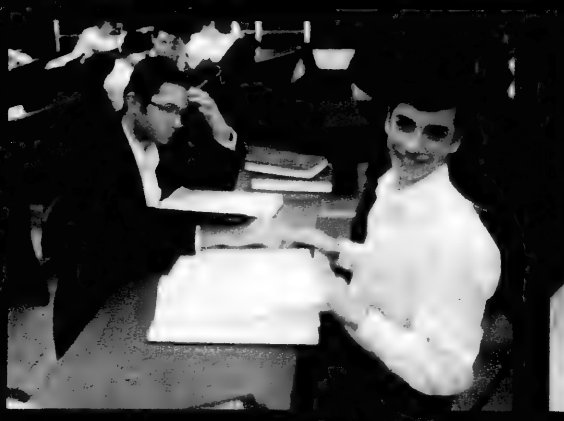
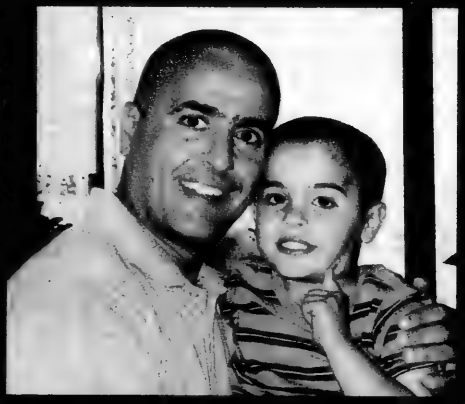
Community Focus

The Canadian Jewish news

Section B





Diversity contributes to community's richness

Jewish community – or aspects of it – can serve as an unexpected common denominator.

In this Community Focus supplement, university student Michelle Bitran writes about a Shabbat dinner in London, England, that a non-Jewish friend organized for a group of exchange students.

Korinne Shefa, also a student, shares some of her experiences in Vancouver and how they helped her appreciate her home community in Thornhill, Ont.

The CJN's summer intern, Laura Fixman, takes a look at issues faced by the deaf Jewish community, while Yosef Tastassa provides insight into the mindset of Israelis living in Canada.

Editorial

The supplement, like the Jewish community itself, offers somewhat of a mixed bag. Its content runs the gamut from Israelis to Russian Jews, intermarried couples, deaf Jews, bar mitzvah students with Asperger syndrome, and people who've taken on leadership roles in the community, such as Elizabeth Wolfe, chair of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's board of directors, and Perry Romberg, recipient of a recent leadership and service award.

It also reflects recent change, from the growth of the Russian Jewish community to the relatively new issue of finding burial ground for interfaith couples.

As well, Jennifer MacLeod writes about the diminishing appeal of synagogue for some men and how congregations are addressing that.

The Jewish community is a diverse group, but at the same time we share common concerns. Although diversity is sometimes at the root of distance between different sectors, it also contributes depth and richness to the tapestry that is our community.

UIAFC director wins award for community service

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Perry Romberg has spent the better part of his career reaching out to and helping his fellow Canadian Jews, wherever they are in the country.

For his efforts, in May he received the Charles "Chuck" Zaionz Community Leadership and Service Award from Canadian Jewish Congress, which is given to a person who best exemplifies the example of amcha and giving back to the community.

Zaionz, who passed away in 2008, was a renowned community activist and also held positions as chairman of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Ontario region; chair of the CJC national executive, and as an officer of Toronto Jewish Congress (predecessor of today's UJA Federation of Greater Toronto).

Speaking to The CJN last week, Romberg, UIA Federations Canada's (UIAFC) director of financial resource development, sought to play down his own work in the community and instead praised Zaionz for the example he set as a Jewish community leader.

"He believed in CJC and the need to represent Canadian Jewry," Romberg said. "My award is secondary. It's about Chuck and who he was... he moved in powerful circles, but he was a man of the people. He represented the best of Jewish community professionals."

Some might say the same about Romberg, who in his current role with UIAFC helps raise funds for Canada's smaller Jewish communities.

Romberg's bio reads like a list of how to give back to the community.

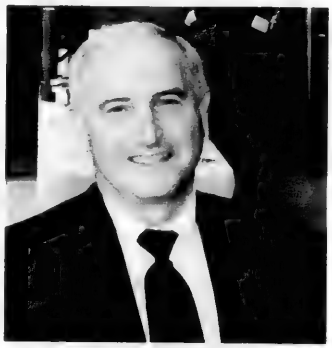
He has been involved professionally in the Toronto Jewish community since 1974, first for 13 years as a clinical social worker at Jewish Family & Child Services. Then from 1987 to 1998, he was executive director of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Canada (JIAS).

"Those were fulfilling, busy years for our little office," Romberg said of his years at JIAS, noting that it was the era of perestroika in the Soviet Union, and JIAS' offices were faced with a huge influx of Russian Jews leaving the USSR to come to Toronto and the West.

From 1998 to 2000, Romberg was assistant director of community planning and allocations for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. Since 2000, he has held various positions at UIAFC, including director of planning and community development, and director of campaign and regional community services.

In effect, Romberg has spent much of the last 11 years visiting and fundraising for the unaffiliated Jewish communities of Canada. It's a job that has taken him all over the country.

"I've gotten to know a lot of Jewish communities and Canada. I'm very privileged," he said.



Perry Romberg

Romberg said his office's mission now is to reach out to aging Jewish community outposts in the country in places such as Owen Sound, Sudbury, Sault Ste. Marie and other small towns where the Jewish populations are dwindling and the children have left for larger centres.

As a result, these older communities' interests in Jewish affairs have become "very low," he said.

"We're trying to be creative in our outreach to them now," Romberg said, noting that his office has launched various Internet initiatives, such as the "virtual cheder" to "get into the living rooms of the smaller communities."

However, he conceded that over the next decade, it's possible many of these Jewish communities will disappear entirely due to attrition.

Romberg said that these days, he's focusing more on soliciting bequests and endowments from those community members to help secure funding for future projects and needs of the remaining unaffiliated Jewish communities.

On the positive side, he said, while many smaller communities are aging and losing motivation to stay connected to Jewish community affairs, some towns have seen recent spikes in Jewish population growth: Kingston and Kitchener in Ontario, and Kelowna, B.C., to name just three.

"We have to reinvent ourselves," Romberg said, speaking about community leadership in general. "It's not just the smaller towns [where unaffiliated Jews live]. It's also a challenge for the major cities, too. Even in Montreal and Toronto, as large as these communities are, there are many unaffiliated Jews who aren't interested. The issue of Jewish identity in the modern age is worldwide. That's why there are inventive programs like March of the Living, Birthright, J-date.

"I'm an observant Jew. Judaism is an introspective religion for me. It's always reinventing itself. It [means] never saying 'that's the way it was so that's the way it should be.'"

The deaf Jewish community in Toronto

Laura Fixman
Intern

With the High Holidays just around the corner, Arthur Gunter of the now inactive Toronto Jewish Association of the Deaf (TJAD) said that finding interpreters for synagogue services is one of the deaf Jewish community's biggest obstacles.

"A lot of interpreters also don't know Hebrew sign language, so that's very difficult," Gunter said.

TJAD was founded in 1980 and had programs at the National Council of Jewish Women's Council House. In 1994, TJAD hosted the first conference in Canada for the National Congress of Jewish Deaf.

Since that time, the group has been in decline, and although there are still a few members, they have not organized any activities in recent years.

When the club first started, TJAD member Martyn Wayne said they had fundraisers every month and a lot of support from corporations.

"I think that now there's a lot of Jewish people that don't really know that we're here," Wayne said.

Wayne and his wife, Andrea, who are both deaf, have several ideas to help TJAD raise awareness. They would like to start a website and are considering going to synagogues to make presentations about the club. They would also like to host parties for holidays like Chanukah or Passover where sign language would be used, and they would like to get a rabbi involved.

The Waynes are members of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue, and they said the rabbi gives them a copy of his sermon in advance so that they can follow along. When the rabbi makes extra comments that aren't written, however, it's difficult for them to follow along, they added.

Solel Congregation in Mississauga has been providing sign language interpreters for 12 years, mainly at their Hebrew school and on certain days for services. They started offering interpreters because a student in the Hebrew school was hearing impaired, and there have since been other members of the congregation who are deaf or hearing impaired.

"We want to make sure that every family can participate in Jewish life," Arliene Botnik, Solel Congregation's director of education, said.

Solel publishes the dates when interpreters will be provided, which Botnik said is about once a month. Sign language is also taught in the Hebrew school, and Botnik and Rabbi Lawrence Englander have learned to sign a few prayers.

"We show the congregation that we can pray with our hands as well as our mouths," Botnik said.

Gunter said it's important for more synagogues to regularly offer interpreters, but another idea would be to have note-takers for open caption, meaning that the words spoken would be printed on a large screen. He said this would be even easier than having interpreters.

Toronto yeshiva for the deaf is one of a kind

He added that they would also like to get volunteers to help them get TJAD going again.

"We want the Jewish community to know that everyone is welcome including rabbis, assistant rabbis, students and anyone who's interested," he said.

Martyn and Andrea Wayne said they would like to have programs that enable members of the deaf Jewish community to learn Hebrew and about holidays, and to have Shabbat programs.

Deaf boys who want to study in a yeshiva can go to Yeshivas Nefesh Dovid in Toronto. According to Libbi Kakon, the wife of the rosh yeshiva, Rabbi Chaim Tzvi Kakon, the 10-year-old school for the deaf is the only one of its kind in the world.

The school was started in 2001 by Rabbi Kakon and Dr. Hartley Bressler because they wanted to help deaf boys who wanted a yeshiva experience.

"My husband couldn't get into a yeshiva growing up because he's deaf, and he didn't want other boys to go through that experience," said Libbi Kakon, who has a hearing loss herself, as do some of their children in varying degrees, although others do not.

At first, she said, she wasn't supportive of the school, but she changed her mind when she saw how the yeshiva took boys who were struggling and prepared them for the future.

"They were dying emotionally and spiritually," Kakon said. "These are kids that didn't want to get up in the morning."

Yeshivas Nefesh Dovid takes students from all over the world including France, Belgium, England and Israel. Kakon said they're successful in part because of their excellent staff, and their Judaic and secular program. After they graduate, students go on to various careers including pharmacy, welding and law. There are about eight to 15 boys a year, and Kakon said they gain more than just an education at the yeshiva.

"The school gives them a strong sense of Jewish identity," she said. "Socially, it's very hard when someone doesn't hear, and a lot of times they're treated like they're deaf first and Jewish second."

The boys come to the school from different backgrounds and levels of Jewish learning. Kakon said parents who send their boys to the yeshiva often have a lot of fears, something she understands. But she also thinks it's important for people to realize that this school is necessary. She added that people with hearing loss are judged on how well they speak, but that doesn't mean that they can't have difficulties if they speak well.

But at the yeshiva, "there's a true, deep-rooted understanding of exactly what makes them tick or exactly what they're going through," she said. "Deafness is a hidden disability, so someone can look, speak and function amazingly, but they can still be suffering."

JRCC still building as it turns 30

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to The CJN

When Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman arrived in Brooklyn from the USSR in 1971 at 15, he dreamed only of studying Torah near the Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson. After witnessing three generations' struggle to remain Jewish, Rabbi Zaltzman believed the fight was over at last. But the rebbe helped him see that for the free world, it was just beginning. "My goal in life changed… to join the Rebbe's army," helping Jews discover the beauty of Judaism.

Today, he's still at it as senior rabbi and founder of the Jewish Russian Community Centre (JRCC), which celebrates its thirtieth anniversary this year.

Dating the woman who became his wife, Rabbi Zaltzman told her "My plan is to… move to any corner of the world the rebbe would send us." She agreed, and in 1981, they were on their way to Toronto with a very special mission – to reach every Russian Jew here.

The rebbe told Rabbi Zaltzman, "They went through World War I, World War II, and seventy years of Communism… that they left Russia still knowing they were Jewish was a tremendous achievement… [we] owe them, to help them to discover what the Soviet Union took away from them."

There were 1,500 Russian Jewish families here at the time. Rabbi Zaltzman's initial goal was to visit two families each day and attend every wedding or funeral in the community, a goal he quickly realized was impossible.

The Jewish Russian Community Centre brings Purim joy to Russian Jews of every age.

Today, that population has grown to about 16,000 families – and yet, in many ways, the JRCC still tries to reach every single one, not just once, but over and over.

"We send them a birthday card every year from 1-year-old to 120 and hopefully older… wedding, anniversary cards… yahrzeit reminders." They also get the JRCC's monthly publication, Exodus, in either Russian or English, and an annual calendar inviting them to programs and classes often planned sixteen months in advance to meet a summer print deadline.

The first JRCC synagogue opened in a temporary location in 1985, moving to its own space in 1987. In 1998, it began expanding around the GTA and beyond with five new branches in Thornhill, Richmond Hill, and even Ottawa, plus four satellite locations offering Shabbat services only.

Seven rabbis and 16,000 families

From a solo operation, the JRCC has swelled to include seven full-time rabbis, their wives and families, and a growing number of support staff offering everything from bar and bat mitzvah programs and holiday parties to immigration and legal assistance, clothing and furniture banks and interest-free loans.

The population served by the JRCC has also grown to 16,000 families, including many who came to Canada after living in Israel. More than half "use some kind of services of our centre on a yearly basis," says Rabbi Zaltzman. Five or six hundred join in for Shabbat services alone.

The secret of the JRCC's success is the rebbe's dual conviction in "the unlimited wealth that is in the soul of every human being," and the need to "help any Jew... in any way possible, to create Jewish continuity."

Whether that means inviting 500 students and singles to a Lag b'Omer party or sending out 700 Passover food packages; setting up more than 10,000 High Holiday seats or buying finger paints for almost a hundred day care children, the JRCC intends to be there for every Russian Jew.

As for the many in the community born to Jewish fathers and non-Jewish mothers, they, too, "need dignity and respect."

As reported last month in The CJN, that has even meant officiating at a funeral for a non-Jewish woman at her husband's request (at a non-Jewish cemetery.) "This is the reality," says Zaltzman. It wasn't the first time such a situation had come up. "Because of our deep Jewish commitment, we do things that nobody else would touch."

"Many... grew up in orphanages and do not know if they are Jewish or not. One of our responsibilities is to help them figure it out. Then we introduce them to Jewish values, and help them embrace the religion."

In terms of services and involvement of Russian Jews, Toronto ranks among the top two or three cities worldwide: the others are in Moscow and Ukraine. "The former Soviet Union in seven decades took away any real emotional, spiritual, intellectual connection to Judaism... Thank God, today a big percentage of them participate in the life of the community."

Thirty years later, Rabbi Zaltzman looks back with satisfaction at the lives the JRCC has touched – but sees also the tremendous work ahead. He's thrilled with the new locations and increased rabbinical staff, but says the community really needs a central location to serve as head office for services, programs and events like simchas.

Despite the JRCC's ties to the worldwide Chabad-Lubavitch organization, there is no central structure to support Chabad houses around the globe, which must raise funds locally. Over 2/3 of the JRCC's $5 million budget is raised from within the Russian-Jewish community.

Though Hebrew-Christian "messianic" groups in the city often target Russian Jews, Rabbi Zaltzman isn't worried. "Because of the former Soviet Union, they are not educated enough... [but] the way to fight darkness is through light; more knowledge of Judaism, more practice of Judaism... more excitement and pride of being a Jew."

"If a Russian Jew doesn't get our publication, or our weekly e-mail, or our birthday card or anniversary card, or any kind of service... in the hospital, in an institution, wherever he or she may be... please call us. We are here to serve every single one the best that we can."

A bar mitzvah program for kids with Asperger's

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

As the date of her son's 13th birthday edged nearer, Connie Putterman knew that the bar mitzvah program offered to members of the Beth Tzedec Congregation wouldn't be a good fit for her son.

Putterman's son has Asperger's syndrome, or high-functioning autism, which causes him to struggle with social situations.

"We wanted something that is going to be tailored more to him, that could also really help him develop, start the process of bar mitzvah, develop social skills, plus understand the whole process of becoming a responsible community member," Putterman said.

When she and her husband approached Beth Tzedec senior Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl about her concerns that the standard bar mitzvah program wouldn't work for their son, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl challenged them to come up with a program that would.

"We had all these very lofty goals in our heads of what we wanted to see out of a bar mitzvah program and the rabbi said, 'OK, come up with one.'"

Just months later, Beth Tzedec launched the Bar/Bat Mitzvah Prep Club, a pilot project for children who struggle with social anxiety, are gifted but have learning disabilities, non-verbal learning disabilities or Asperger's syndrome and require a program better suited to their needs.

Putterman said the program, which is highly subsidized by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, was inspired by her son, who "is very high-functioning, who is very capable, gifted and inquisitive."

She said the Jewish community lacks high-level social skills groups for kids like her son, who will be bar mitzvah age in April.

"We decided we wanted something rich in content for a group of kids who can be really challenged academically and intellectually, but are highly cognitive."

Putterman and her husband, who have made many connections over the years with both families and professionals who are involved with autism and Asperger's, approached those they hoped would want to jump on board the pilot project.

"We got highly-skilled psychologists, social workers, PhD psychology students who run social skills groups for Asperger's kids, people who've worked at CAMH [Centre for Addiction and Mental Health]. They all work on a volunteer basis," Putterman said.

Beth Tzedec Rabbi Adam Cutler provides the Jewish content for the program, which is open to both members and non-members.

Since the weekly sessions began in late April, only four children have signed up for the program, but Putterman said they're looking for ways to expand and spread the word, as well as to incorporate tikkun olam projects to help the children consider other people's perspectives and the concept of giving back.

"I hope he may be able to think in his teen years about being involved in Jewish communal life, whether it's through some of the youth groups or helping Ve'ahavta [a Jewish humanitarian organization] in some way."

But for now, Putterman said the group – which has stopped meeting for the summer and plans to resume in the fall – has focused on discussion and compromise, with each family looking at what their son expects from his bar mitzvah and what the parents expect of him.

"We're really discovering the things that are cool for [our son] and the things that aren't cool, and our expectations, and where our expectations differ and where they are the same," Putterman said, adding that she expects her son, who is very uncomfortable about being the centre of attention, to go on the bimah and read the Torah.

She said the group sessions not only serve as a "jumping off point for them to be members of the Jewish community," but also gives them a say in the matter and a feeling that they are part of any decision.

"One of my goals is for my son not to go home after the service and for him to stay for an hour for a luncheon or something, which he doesn't want to do... He doesn't like to be kissed every five seconds... Those things really make him anxious," Putterman said.

"So how do I celebrate with my family and friends and encourage them not to be all over him? My son came up with a brilliant idea. He said that if he's going to have any kind of event, he'd like to do a receiving line, where people could have half an hour to wish him a mazel tov, and then no more."

Putterman, who was impressed with her son's compromise, expressed another goal for her son – that he'll learn to enjoy being a part of the congregation and going to services.

"I think it's about accepting the responsibility of being a Jewish adult."

For more information about the program, contact Rabbi Adam Cutler at Beth Tzedec at 416-781-3514, ext. 219.

Mini School celebrates 10th anniversary

Laura Fixman
Intern

The Florence Melton Adult Mini School has come a long way in Toronto since it started in 2001 with 13 students in evening classes at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

The Melton Mini School is offered in about 60 cities and now holds morning classes at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, as well as at Beth Sholom Synagogue, Shaarei Shomayim Congregation and Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

To ensure good quality teaching, faculty members participate in ongoing adult education programs.

"The teachers have been outstanding, each and every one, and the folks in the head offices of Chicago and Jerusalem have a close relationship with us," Loretta Tanenbaum, the Melton Toronto director said.

The school, part of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, was founded in 1986 by Florence Zacks Melton, a community activist and a longtime supporter of Jewish education.

After completing two years of core classes, students receive a certificate of completion from Hebrew U. There are four core courses offered over a two-year period. Classes meet for two hours once a week, for 30 weeks. The courses include Rhythms of Jewish Life, Purposes of Jewish Living and Ethics and Dramas of Jewish Living (history). There are also several graduate classes, although those aren't restricted only to graduates.

Tanenbaum said students have told her that the school has given them a thirst for learning and the ability to speak with their grandchildren who attend day school and answer their friends' questions about Judaism.

At the Mini School, questioning and dialogue are encouraged in class. Textbooks reflect the spectrum of Jewish thought so that students from all streams of Judaism are comfortable participating, Tanenbaum said.

"It has been a privilege to work with a team dedicated to bringing high quality education to the Jewish community of Toronto," she said.

Throughout any given year in Toronto, there may be as many as 80 students taking classes. In the coming year, Melton is hoping to offer a new class called Foundations, which will run for 20 weeks in the Thornhill area, and is for parents of day school children. Tanenbaum said that this is only one change to be made to the school in the next 10 years.

"We are beginning our 11th year in October, and we consider it to be the first [course] of the next 10 years," she said.

Florence Melton died in 2007, after her idea of widespread adult Jewish education became an educational franchise.

"She was a creative woman with a vision, and that vision is still with us today," Tanenbaum said.

There are Mini Schools throughout the United States, Canada, the United Kingdom and Australia, attended by more 5,000 students. There are no examinations and no prerequisites to enter the school.

The school is the largest pluralistic adult Jewish education network in the world. Tanenbaum said that students have the opportunity to share their thoughts and experiences, which provides an enriched perspective.

SCHOOL PREP: On Aug. 7, Na'amat Canada Toronto, led by member Lindsi Hollend along with approximately 40 other volunteers, packed more than 1,300 backpacks with school supplies for children in local shelters. They had four separate production lines categorized by age and grade. Along with backpacks containing binders, paper, notebooks and pencil cases filled with pens, pencils, erasers, glue, highlighters, pencil crayons and more, the shelters also received lunch bags for each child and toiletries for moms.

Bring back the boys: the vanishing Canadian male Jew?

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to The CJN

No man is an island – except maybe in shul, where men may be a vanishing breed. And after decades of "Can't live with 'em" jokes, it turns out Judaism needs men. "It's a very large problem," says Stan Greenspan, vice-president of the Federation of Jewish Mens' Clubs (FJMC).

FJMC, the umbrella organization for more than 250 Conservative/Masorti synagogue brotherhoods in North America, is fighting back with its Mentschen.org website, featuring articles and issues of significance to today's Jewish men. In one article on the site, The Shrinking Male Member, author Art Spar asks "Thirty years ago I was surrounded by men in synagogue... What happened?"

Stan Greenspan

Greenspan believes Canada is about twenty to thirty years behind the United States in this as with other issues, like intermarriage. Beth Tzedec's Rabbi Adam Cutler agrees. "What trends there does eventually trend here." At a summer program at Brandeis University, Rabbi Cutler noticed a 3:1 ratio of female to male participants. "That's not unheard of in a Jewish youth program."

For Greenspan, the delay between the U.S. and Canada is good news – it means "we have a chance to solve things before they happen." He also believes no one movement is affected more than others. In any synagogue, "no matter what you do, you're going to have somebody who doesn't want to do that."

Rabbi Adam Cutler

What's driving men away? Brandeis graduate student Daniel Parmer, co-author of a landmark paper on gender and Judaism, has said, "Boys and men as a group are not attracted to feminized Jewish activities and environments. To the extent that we want a non-controversial Judaism, men will shy away."

"As women have become empowered in Reform Judaism," explained Temple Har Zion's Rabbi Cory Weiss in a 2009 interview with The CJN, "there has been concern about disempowering men." He added, "We at Har Zion don't have this problem...but we certainly want to avoid it."

Rabbi Cutler says "the fewer male leaders, the fewer male participants there are going to be." Like Weiss, he says his own synagogue has been less affected thanks, in part, to retaining some gender distinctions. Though Beth Tzedec "recently increased the ritual participation of women [allowing them to be counted as part of the minyan], we're still not fully egalitarian," and most parts of the service are still only led by men.

Beth Tzedec has had particular success with teenage boys, who are, according to Greenspan, the "least involved Judaic group." Rabbi Cutler credits an effective youth director and programs like Shabbat floor hockey.

Male attendance drop 'an issue for entire community'

Rabbi Chaim Strauchler

Rabbi Chaim Strauchler of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation says this is nothing new: adolescents "do explore; they're looking out for different things." Beyond separate bar/bat mitzvah programs, though, Shaarei Shomayim isn't focusing on single-sex activities. "We have to find avenues to engage young men and young women." There's a regular teen minyan as well as father/son and mother/daughter programming. "If you offer something of quality, you want everybody to participate."

Moving Traditions, a US-based organization, recently published Engaging Jewish Teenage Boys: A Call to Action, with seven major recommendations, including "hire a strong male educator," and "work with, not against, students' physicality, energy and need for activity."

And it turns out Jewish men want what the boys want – on grown-up terms. "You've got to have the brotherhood... to get together, be guys; do the goofy stuff guys do – not that we do goofy stuff," Greenspan adds. What the guys want are physical outlets, but also team building, leadership training and discussion groups dealing with male issues – aging parents, unemployment, health issues – head-on.

Rabbi Strauchler, who hasn't "noticed a difference as far as male or female participation changing over the years," says if anything, Shaarei Shomayim's brotherhood is actually "more stable than our sisterhood," which was traditionally run by volunteer homemakers – women whose time may now be pre-empted by careers. But despite Shaarei Shomayim's commitment to gender equality, ritual feminization has not been an issue. "Each gender has a unique role to play... it's a crucial value that we build our communities around."

In attracting men, synagogues sometimes send mixed messages. Few would question the need for a sisterhood for "women to get together and bond," while the men's club raises eyebrows, says Greenspan: "Why do you need that? You've got the rest of the stuff that's going on."

Rabbi Michael Skobac

Sexism is rampant. "Nobody says 'you can't have a woman in that job'," but we still don't accept a man who wants to leave his job to raise a family. A woman can take a year off with a baby; "a man, the eyebrow goes up again." Men's clubs help "teach men how to cope with society."

But Rabbi Michael Skobac of Jews for Judaism says Spar's article asks the synagogue to serve "a lot of purposes other than what it's ultimately there to do," but does not include a single mention of God.

"If the synagogue is supposed to be there for male camaraderie, there might be quite a few other places that are even better – the golf course, basketball court...even a Jewish bowling or softball league." As for companionship and support, "they can get it from their therapist, get it from friends... I don't know if they can get it from their synagogue."

If the synagogue stays on mission, "primarily as a place to intensify and develop our relationship with God, I think that we're not going to find people losing interest in it... If that's what it's there for, it doesn't have to compete."

Greenspan says FJMC is also working in that direction through projects like its "World Wide Wrap," an annual tfillin festival with 300,000 participants over the past ten years. It encourages its leaders to participate in minyanim and Birkat Hamazon. "The leadership leads and the membership follows."

Ultimately, says Rabbi Skobac, any drop in attendance isn't a man's issue; it's an issue for the entire Jewish community. "We need to make synagogues more effective as places of prayer and places of spirituality."

Congregations welcome new clergy

Laura Fixman
Intern

Several congregations in the Greater Toronto Area have seen new faces in the past few months, as new clergy take up their positions. They bring a wide variety of experience to the congregation they now call home.

Rabbi Micah Streiffer, Temple Kol Ami

Rabbi Micah Streiffer, who is from North Carolina, became the rabbi of Temple Kol Ami on July 1. He got a BA in Judaic studies with a minor in music from George Washington University, and he was ordained as a rabbi in 2007 at the Cincinnati campus of Hebrew Union College. He plays piano and guitar and has received awards for Jewish scholarship, including awards for his sermons.

For the past four years Rabbi Streiffer was the associate rabbi at Temple Beth El in Charlotte, N.C., where his accomplishments included participation in interfaith activities such as the first Jewish-Muslim seder in Charlotte. He is joining Temple Kol Ami at a time of change for the congregation, as Leo Baeck Day School's Thornhill campus will make Kol Ami its permanent home after significant renovations.

Cantor David Edwards, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue

Beth Emeth welcomed a new cantor on July 1, David Edwards. Edwards moved to Canada in 1974 after growing up in Newcastle upon Tyne in the United Kingdom. He started studying as a cantor after his mother died in 1993, and in 2000, he became the cantor at the Lodzer Centre Congregation in Toronto, where he stayed for nine years.

Edwards was at Beth Tzedec Congregation in Calgary from 2009-2011. There he played a role in teaching synagogue members of all ages and always emphasized that it was important to keep them engaged in the synagogue. He had the opportunity to work with the Rinaton Choir during the High Holidays, and has also served as guest cantor at congregations in Toronto, Florida, Israel and England. He has appeared at the New York convention of the Cantors Council of America and is still active in the Toronto Council of Chazzanim.

Rabbi Dov Schochet, Beth Jacob V'Anshei Drildz Congregation

On April 5, Rabbi Dov Schochet became the rabbi of Beth Jacob V'Anshei Drildz Congregation, bringing his diverse experiences to the position. He was ordained as a rabbi at the Central Lubavitch Yeshiva in Brooklyn, N.Y. After he married his wife, Ruti, who is from Argentina, in 2000, he moved to Jerusalem and studied Halachah for two years.

Rabbi Schochet has been extensively involved in international Jewish communities in Liverpool and Manchester, England, and in Belarus. He travelled during Jewish holidays to various Jewish communities including those in Cuba, some Carribean Islands and Italy. He has also worked in Israel with the Israel Defence Forces. Since 2003, he has been a rabbi at the Lubavitch Yeshiva of Toronto. Rabbi Schochet has five children, four boys and one girl.

Temple Sinai has welcomed three new clergy members in recent weeks.

Rabbi Ilan Emanuel, Temple Sinai

Rabbi Ilan Emanuel, who joined Temple Sinai on July 1, grew up in the United Kingdom where his father was a rabbi at a Reform congregation in London. He worked as a solicitor in London, but realized that his true passion was in Jewish law, not secular law. He studied at the Hebrew Union College – Jewish Institute of Religion in Cincinnati and was ordained as a rabbi in May 2005. In August 2005, he became the rabbi of Congregation B'nai Jeshurun, the South Street Temple, in Lincoln, Neb.

At B'nai Jeshurun, Rabbi Emanuel was involved in adult education. He enjoyed leading Torah study classes because he felt that he learned a lot from his students.

He also taught Judaism to local churches and university groups, and he found the experience rewarding because it gave him a different perspective, looking at questions he said he never would have thought of. Rabbi Emanuel is married and has a six-year-old daughter.

Rabbi Daniel Mikelberg, Temple Sinai

Rabbi Daniel Mikelberg, who became a rabbi at Temple Sinai on July 1, was born in Montreal but grew up in Vancouver.

He completed his studies at Hebrew Union College – Jewish Institute of Religion in Los Angeles, and was ordained in May 2008. He then returned to the synagogue where he grew up, Temple Sholom in Vancouver, as an assistant rabbi.

Rabbi Mikelberg studied in Jerusalem for two years, and he has completed work projects in El Salvador and Ghana. On a Hillel-sponsored trip when he was a student, he worked in a small community after a civil war, painting and planting among other activities. He went to Ghana with the American Jewish World Service on a trip with rabbis of different denominations.

While there, they built a school, and Rabbi Mikelberg said it was a good way to build relations with the local community and a way for the rabbis to get to know each other. While at Temple Sholom, he initiated a volunteer program at a local homeless shelter on Sunday nights, and was involved with programming for people in their 20s and 30s. He plans to be involved in similar programming at Temple Sinai.

Cantor Tamar Havilio, Temple Sinai

Cantor Tamar Havilio joined Temple Sinai on Aug. 2.

She has run cantorial studies and prayer workshops at Hebrew Union College in Jerusalem since 2002, but decided to take some time off to renew her love of congregational life in North America. She was inspired to become a cantor by Aviva Katzman, who was the cantor at Temple Sholom in Chicago. Havilio is originally from Milwaukee, Wis., and has an undergraduate degree in theatre from the University of Iowa. She was invested as a cantor in 1996 by Hebrew Union College. She hopes to bring to the Toronto Jewish community a prayer workshop she developed, and will use her experience to teach future rabbis, cantors and Jewish educators while serving at Temple Sinai.

Rabbi Daniel Korobkin, Beth Avraham Yosef of Toronto Congregation

Rabbi Daniel Korobkin took up his position as senior rabbi at Beth Avraham Yosef of Toronto Congregation on Aug. 15. He was formerly the rabbi at Kehillat Yavneh Synagogue in Los Angeles, where he served as spiritual leader of Yeshiva Yavneh, an elementary school on Kehillat Yavneh's campus. He was director of community and synagogue services in the Orthodox Union's West Coast region. He is also a doctoral candidate in medieval Jewish studies at University of California – Los Angeles.

Rabbi Korobkin was ordained at the Ner Israel Rabbinical College in Baltimore. He received his master of science at Johns Hopkins University and wrote a column for Hakol, a Jewish newspaper in the Lehigh Valley. He was the founding rabbi of the Young Israel Synagogue of San Diego and was rabbi for Sons of Israel Congregation in Allentown, Penn.

Rabbi Yehuda Zarchi, Chabad Laureleaf

Rabbi Yehuda Zarchi, 27, will be running the new branch of Chabad Lubavitch of Markham, which will be in the Bayview and Steeles avenues area. He was born and raised in Crown Heights, Brooklyn. He received his ordination as a rabbi in 2005 from Heichal Menachem in Melbourne, Australia.

Rabbi Zarchi has had experience leading services throughout the year at various synagogues including Congregation B'nai Avraham in Brooklyn Heights, N.Y., and Congregation Chevra Thilim in San Francisco. He was also involved in developing Jewish life programs on various college campuses, among them the University of Florida, the University of Michigan and the University of Texas. In addition, he has done outreach work, providing kosher food, religious articles and education, in several Jewish communities including Burlington, Vt., Newtown, Penn., Queenstown, New Zealand, and Montevideo, Uruguay.

He will be holding High Holiday services for Chabad at Laureleaf at the Adventure Valley Day Camp at 7015 Leslie St.

Birthright: 'The most fun when you least expect it'

Laura Fixman
Intern

Many people say their best memories of their first trip to Israel are things like the view at the top of Masada or the seeing the Western Wall for the first time. The moments that stood out for me however, on my trip with Birthright in May 2010, were different than that. They often happened when I was either exhausted, smelled terrible, or often, a combination of the two. If anything, my first trip to Israel taught me that you have the most fun when you least expect it.

Being thrown together with 39 people I had never met, and being forced to do things I normally would not do, was not as terrifying as I had expected. In fact, it was those people, that location, and those activities that changed my life forever.

The first of these life-changing moments happened hours after we had landed in Israel. After not sleeping on the plane all I could think about was when I could go to bed. We arrived on a Friday afternoon, which meant that Shabbat was just a few hours away. Before there was even time to process what was going on, we went to the Western Wall, and that's when I saw it for the first time. It was not the simply fact that I was there that took my breath away; it was that everybody stood there in just as much awe as me. These strangers and I had something in common.

While standing there, I heard someone mention the singer Rihanna. I looked around until I saw why they were all whispering. There was Rihanna, in Israel, at the Western Wall. All the girls were excited. For the next few days at least, all everyone could talk about was seeing her. It was not what people expected from their first visit to the Wall, but it was the first of many experiences that brought us together. All of the moments that stand out in my mind from that trip have to do with us feeling united as a group.

Another moment that stands out for me was in the Negev, when we were dusty, dirty, and probably smelled bad. We were supposed to go on a camel ride, despite the fact that the camels were spitting, trying to bite people, and smelled horrible. I was nervous about getting on the camel, because it was so high off the ground and I'm very short. It did not help that it looked like one of them wanted to bite me. My friend and I decided to name our camel Sally, referencing the children's song. Another camel was named Alejandro, after a Lady Gaga song. We must have looked strange singing these songs through the desert.

The trip of a lifetime

After our camel rides, we gathered around a bonfire and shared secrets about ourselves.

We were supposed to sleep in large, round tents that night, but no one did much sleeping. Instead, we stayed up all night talking and playing games that the IDF soldiers in our group taught us. The ground was too hard to sleep on anyway.

We did not mind that we had to get ready to climb a mountain at 4 a.m. We were a unit, even in the early morning in the middle of the desert.

I climbed two mountains while in Israel, although one climb was more memorable than the other. I remember the hike up Masada, and it was not only because of the view at the top. The day did not start out great, because I could not find my running shoes. Luckily, one of my roommates lent me her extra pair. When we arrived at the bottom of Masada and were told we had to climb to the top, I was terrified. The temperature was over 35 C, and I'll admit I am not in the best mountain climbing shape.

I was sweating as soon as we started walking, I was having difficulties breathing, and it seemed like everyone was miles ahead of me. I persevered because I knew the reward would be at the top, but it felt like it took days to get there. Finally I made it, and something amazing happened. Most of my group was already at the top, and they all said they were proud of me. That was when I knew that because of this trip, I could accomplish anything I wanted.

I can honestly say that this trip was a life changing experience for me. After the Birthright portion of the trip ended, I spent two weeks with my grandfather's family in Tel Aviv, and I can't wait to go back as soon as I can afford to. It was a small, perfect taste of Israel and it has left me hungry for more.

Though it has been a year, and I am not yet more involved in the Jewish community in Toronto, I believe it has awakened a desire that wasn't there before I went to Israel.

Birthright helped me develop a connection to Israel that will lead to things I never would have done otherwise.

Shul to feature Israeli choir for High Holidays

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Cantor Alex Stein is bringing the Kol Rina choir to Toronto's Adath Israel Congregation to accompany him for the High Holidays, both to foster connection to Israel and as a way to do something "a little different and a little special."

"I look at the yom tov services as the Super Bowl of the synagogue. It's our biggest time of the year," Stein said in a phone interview from Minneapolis, where he was visiting family.

"If we're trying to play a Super Bowl... I want to bring in the best [players] we have."

A Sydney, Australia, native who has served at Adath Israel for the past two years, Stein also brought an Israeli choir for six consecutive years to Calgary's Beth Tzedec Congregation, where he was cantor before moving to Toronto.

He doesn't know of any other synagogues in Canada that have done the same thing. "It's a big thing for us, and I think it's a big thing for the community."

Kol Rina – which Stein says is one of the up-and-coming new choirs in Israel – will also sing at a community Slichot service Sept. 24 at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue. The service will bring together five Conservative congregations in all: Adath Israel, Beth David, Beth Sholom Synagogue, Beth Torah Congregation, and the Lodzer Centre.

The eight-man choir, whose name means Voices of Joy – is led by Roi Azulai, a conductor in his early thirties and a friend of Stein's. The choir members are professional musicians, and four of them also have opera careers.

Cantor Alex Stein

Adath Israel's own choir, which includes men and women, will be off for the High Holidays and will sing again on Sukkot.

Much of the choir's music will be liturgical, but there will also be some prayers sung to opera tunes and maybe even one or two Broadway tunes, Stein said.

After the holidays, Stein will lead a two-week musical tour to Israel. The shul trip, which is sold out, will have 45 participants and will include Shabbat davening with Kol Rina as well as a musical cruise on the Kinneret, a private piano concert by Israeli pianist Yitzhak Tavior, and a "surprise" cantorial concert in Tel Aviv.

Federation's head of Israeli affairs speaks out

Yossi Tastassa
Special to The CJN

The unique circumstances of her life and her rich personal experience have prepared Galya Sarner perfectly for her dual role as the director of the Israeli-Canadian project at the Schwartz/Reisman community centre and the head of Israeli affairs at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

When I asked Sarner about her identity, I expected an answer that would include the Israeli part and the Canadian part, but I was surprised.

"Above all, I am a mother and a wife," said Sarner. "No matter where I have been or will be in my life and what I will do, my family is the most important thing, and it is the torch that accompanies me and lights my way along the road," she added.

Sarner grew up in the old Katamon neighbourhood in Jerusalem. Her father was born in Jerusalem; her mother came to Israel from Iraq in the early 1950s.

After completing her military service, Galya studied education. She has a bachelor's degree in special education and theatre arts and a master's degree in education. For her thesis, she wrote about "multi-cultures in Israeli society," focusing her research on the difficulties encountered by women educators who immigrated to Israel from the former Soviet Union in the early 1990s. Sarner admires these women and says that their impact on her life was deep and strong. "Meeting them was exciting. They filled me with strength."

Galya Sarner

Her husband, Robert, who was born in Toronto, is director of communications and public affairs at Roots Canada. A former journalist in France and Israel, he used to write a column from Jerusalem for The CJN. The couple met during one of Robert's visits to Israel.

"Robert worked in Paris in corporate communications," said Sarner. "His visits to Israel connected him to his Jewish roots. Our relationship strengthened his identity," she added.

A year after they met, the Sarners married and moved to Paris. While Robert was busy at work, Galya became involved with the local Jewish community, which she described as exciting and multi-faceted. She worked for a Jewish radio program called Radio J Shalom, studied photography and expanded her ties with members of the community. The Sarners lived in Paris for five years, and their daughters, Aviv and Shani, were born there.

"My purpose is to put the Israeli community on the map, to give it identity and space to grow, and especially legitimacy," Sarner said. "It is important that we open our doors for the Israelis wherever they are. It is important that that door be open in both directions – in the direction of Israel and, of course, in the direction to Canada. It is important to me that Israeli communal life is rich and vibrant and that social activities for the community will increase."

Some of her most satisfying accomplishments have included helping to organize the celebration of Israel's 61st anniversary, the integration of the Israeli community into federation's annual Walk with Israel, the inauguration of Ilan Ramon Boulevard in Thornhill, Ont., and the organization of a rally in support of Gilad Schalit, the Israeli soldier who was abducted by Hamas in 2006.

Sarner spoke optimistically about her plans for the coming year in which she hopes to further develop programs for the Israeli and larger Jewish community.

Federation chair follows in her dad's footsteps

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Elizabeth Wolfe sometimes jokes that, for her, "community" is the family business.

The chair of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's board of directors since last November, Wolfe – a lawyer by training, and a mother of two university-age children and two older stepchildren – is the third person in her family to hold that position, following in the steps of her mother, Rose, and her late father, Ray.

Elizabeth Wolfe

As well, her volunteer work – which has become her full-time avocation – includes board membership on the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, The Canadian Jewish News, the Shalom Hartman Institute and a history of involvement with a host of other, mostly Jewish, organizations and agencies.

For years, when she was growing up, there were a lot of people coming and going in her house, attending meetings and dinners, Wolfe recalls. "I think growing up in that environment just creates a sense of normalcy that community is part of your life."

Ray Wolfe's commitment to the Jewish community was also evident when he led a group of investors 40 years ago in purchasing The CJN and expanding its coverage and reach. His daughter, who was an undergraduate student at Harvard University at the time, remembers that he spoke about his vision for the paper as "a voice for the community," as well as an advocate and a voice for Israel.

She got an up-close look at the relationship between the paper and the community in the summer of 1975, as a student intern at The CJN, copy-editing and writing stories.

"It was a wonderful experience," she said, adding that she's "not sure [the staff] were so thrilled in the beginning because I didn't have any journalism experience, and I was the publisher's daughter."

Wolfe's work at the paper – including a two-part front-page story on the opening of Baycrest Terrace – afforded her "an interesting introduction to community life and the complications of community life… [as well as] the tensions between focusing on the positive initiatives versus dealing with the questions and the challenges that any organization faces."

Among the challenges facing the community today, she cited the economy, engaging the younger generation, political issues regarding delegitimization of Israel and the resulting need for advocacy.

"I don't think as a community we are over the impact of the recession," said Wolfe. "There are still all kinds of needs out there in terms of the vulnerable elements of the community."

In a more positive vein, she said Toronto is "a wonderful community," with advantages over many American cities including generational continuity and a larger percentage of children at Jewish day schools (resulting in strong Jewish identities).

At the same time, the Jewish community is in "a transition period," she said, referring in part to its recently reconfigured national advocacy structure. Wolfe, whose CV lists her as a director of Canadian Jewish Congress (whose function has been absorbed into the new advocacy entity) thinks that in a year or two, people will view the changes more positively.

As well, in the Toronto area, construction continues on the Lebovic campus in Vaughan, Ont., and construction is expected to begin next year on a new Jewish Community Centre on what is now called the Sherman Campus, on Bathurst Street north of Sheppard Avenue. It will replace the former Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, which closed in 2009, and was subsequently torn down.

Programming has started at both locations, and progress is visible at Lebovic, Wolfe said. "There's a real interest and anticipation in that campus opening, because of the programming and vibrancy it's going to provide to the community."

Wolfe said that programming revenue and some commercial revenue will help support the new facility at Bathurst Street and Weldrick Road. She expects it will be fully self-supporting within five years. Construction funding, which is separate from the annual UJA campaign, includes provision for startup costs in the initial years of operation, she explained.

In the years ahead, Wolfe expects that Toronto will "continue to be the fastest-growing Jewish community in Canada" as well as one of the strongest, with "a vibrancy in education, culture and Israel engagement that will attract people from other communities."

Shuls take softer approach to intermarriage

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Most Toronto rabbis – Orthodox, Conservative and Reform – will tell you that the phenomenon of parents ripping their shirts and reciting the mourner's Kaddish when their Jewish children intermarry is largely a thing of the past.

"Intermarriage is a fact of Jewish life at this point, and the question is, what can we do to help as many Jewish families of whatever composition live as meaningful a Jewish life as possible?" said Rabbi Michael Dolgin, who leads the Reform congregation Temple Sinai.

Beth Tzedec Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, senior rabbi of the Conservative synagogue, said that the Jewish community in Toronto has begun to reflect the multicultural community it is based in.

"We have people at Beth Tzedec who are Caucasian, black, Asian. We have people who come from a whole variety of ethnic backgrounds, but our community has remained primarily mono-religious," Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said, adding that we should accept people of different ethnic and cultural backgrounds, but try "to maintain a sense of one religious community."

Although all of the rabbis interviewed for this article said they see many instances of intermarriage, they were all vague about the numbers in their own congregations.

But a 2010 study by the Knesset Information and Research Centre in Israel reported that intermarriage rates among Diaspora Jews have increased by more than 200 per cent over the past 50 years.

It said that in the United States, 55 per cent of all Jews marry non-Jewish partners, while rates in Australia and Canada fluctuate between 25 and 30 per cent.

Chabad Lubavitch of Markham Rabbi Avraham Plotkin feels that intermarriage is "probably the greatest challenge of the Jewish people today."

"In the olden days, people used to sit shiva. The point of the shiva was to show how strongly we feel about it," Rabbi Plotkin said.

He added that children must understand that when it comes to intermarriage, there can be no compromise.

"We encourage parents and anyone involved to be totally strong about not encouraging, God forbid, an intermarriage and to let the kids know in no uncertain terms how hurtful it would be to them and that they will not accept it," he said.

"But the second aspect is that we should try to save the Jewish person after it has been done and to work with them in the best way we can... No Jew will be left behind."

'Not beneficial' to write off Jews who intermarry

Reform Judaism formally opposes the practice of rabbis officiating at interfaith weddings, but it allows each rabbi to decide. Yet although some surveys say that 50 per cent of Reform rabbis in the United States would do so, Rabbi Dolgin said no Reform rabbi in Toronto would officiate at a wedding of a Jew to a non-Jew.

He said he chooses not to focus his energy on actively preventing intermarriage, hoping instead that the refusal of rabbis to officiate at interfaith marriages is enough of a signal that "being with someone with a strong Jewish identity is good for our community in the long run. But we take people where they are."

He said he tells Temple Sinai's Hebrew school students that "there are two kinds of people to marry: people who are Jewish, and people who aren't Jewish yet."

Rabbis Dolgin, Frydman-Kohl and Plotkin each agreed that conversion is the best approach when it comes to an interfaith marriage.

"Jewish people have this strange idea that there is something not OK about encouraging someone else who is important in their life to consider Judaism, and I think that is an important idea," Rabbi Dolgin said. "Why would we not give them the opportunity to consider this tradition for themselves?"

Rabbi Plotkin said that although he recognizes that encouraging non-Jewish spouses to convert could "backfire" by giving people the impression that intermarriage is tolerated in the Orthodox community, "if it does happen, we have to try to pick up the pieces.

"Let's say the woman is Jewish and the children are Jewish. We will try to gently suggest to the father to consider conversion, because it is important that his children have a Jewish father," Rabbi Plotkin said.

> 'Choosing one spiritual path provides framework for raising children'

"We try to make the families as homogeneous as possible and to try to see that the father will help the mother in passing on the Jewish values."

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said the first step in dealing with an interfaith marriage is to encourage the parents to accept the non-Jewish partner.

"Obviously, the hierarchy or desirability is that [the non-Jewish spouse] will choose Judaism."

He explained that a couple has enough challenges to face in a relationship and deciding on one spiritual path will help a couple "ground their relationship" and provide them with a framework when it comes to raising children.

If the non-Jewish partner decides not to convert, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said he hopes they at least "choose a Jewish life and try to find a pathway to that Jewish life."

Those who choose not to convert are still welcome to attend synagogue services, although they may not become official members.

"Our goal is to say to them, on some level, 'This is your choice, and we respect your choice, but you now need to think about whether you want to be part of the community, and if you do, we will look for a way to help your spouse who is not Jewish feel connected,'" Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said.

"We'll provide High Holiday tickets... and we want the non-Jewish partner to be a supportive non-Jewish spouse."

He added that Jews who choose to intermarry should still feel like valued members of the Jewish community.

"The days when people were written off if they intermarry, I think that almost everyone agrees that it's not an approach that is beneficial to our community. Although there are still people who adhere to that," Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said.

In a 2004 CJN article that covered a panel titled "Can we decide, and not divide?" Adath Israel Congregation's spiritual leader, Rabbi Steven Saltzman, said his synagogue is probably the only Conservative shul in North America to ask members to leave if they marry a non-Jew.

"In the end, they have to respect our decision to build a community of Jews married to Jews [and] raising Jewish children," he said, adding that those who convert would be welcomed "with open arms."

Welcoming interfaith couples, but keeping boundaries

Today however, Adath Israel executive director Bernie Rabinovitch said that this policy "is currently under review," declining to comment further.

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl, who was on that panel with Rabbi Saltzman seven years ago, said this is an issue all congregations have to wrestle with.

"How do we maintain our borders and our boundaries, and at the same time, become a welcoming community? We are challenged by that."

Rabbi Plotkin said that to become a member of the Markham Chabad, one must be a Jew, and if a Jewish male marries a non-Jew who does not convert, he, too, cannot be a member of the synagogue.

"It's a practical thing, because if the children are not Jewish, it creates a whole [problem]. That is the general policy, but we do try very hard to keep anyone, if there are Jewish members in the family, we try to keep them involved."

Rabbi Dolgin said his shul also has a membership policy when it comes to interfaith couples, albeit a more lenient one.

"The non-Jewish members of a family are part of a family membership, but are not individual members in the synagogue themselves," he said, adding that it is important to welcome anyone who wants to embrace the Jewish community.

"If we spend all our time in judgment over who they married... it leaves us precious little energy to welcome people and have them feel comfortable giving their children the kind of education that would be meaningful," he said.

Over the past few years, Rabbi Dolgin has been working on purchasing a section of the Lambton Hills Cemetery in the city's west end to accommodate the burial of interfaith couples who cannot be buried together in Jewish-only cemeteries.

"It's been a slow and long process, because we're dealing with the government and licensing and all these other ridiculous things.

However, the concept of that is when you welcome other people into your community, you do so by welcoming them as who they are, not with an agenda."

Rabbi Plotkin said that although there is no way to prevent intermarriage, "the greater the sacrifice, the more the commitment, the more the level of observance, the less of a chance of intermarriage in the family."

> 'A slow and long process' to accommodate burial of mixed couples

But Rabbi Dolgin said that children of interfaith parents might be just as connected to Judaism as children of two Jewish parents, provided they're exposed to Jewish education and traditions in the home.

"When it comes to creating a healthy Jewish identity in a child, the most important thing is to live in a home that identifies as a Jewish home and to have consecutive years of formal Jewish education, whether part time or full time," Rabbi Dolgin said.

Whatever a person's religious tradition, ethnic or cultural background, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said, "everybody is worthy of respect and can find a place in our religious community."

Israel remains integral part of Israelis here

Yosef Tastassa and his son, Ori

Yosef Tastassa
Special to The CJN

According to the official statistics in the State of Israel, about one million people have left the country since its establishment in 1948 and have chosen to live their lives abroad. Most of the Israelis who left Israel live in the U.S. and Canada.

For many Israelis, establishing a new life abroad is a dream. The majority of Israelis who live abroad, and in Canada in particular, will say that their move was made with the hope of a calmer life, improved economic options and a better future for their children.

Individuals and families have invested a fortune to obtain the required documents for living and working abroad. They also needed mental strength to make such a big change in the middle of their lives, leaving behind familiar habits, culture and environment to suddenly embark on a trip to the unknown.

But those who have built new lives in Canada did not turn their backs on Israel, their homeland. On the contrary, in some ways their Israeli identity becomes stronger abroad. Sometimes it seems that many Israelis who live in Canada actually are still living "in Israel" except of course it is Canadian air that they breathe.

Is there a paradox here?

If we left Israel because we believed our future and our children's future would be better in Canada, why do we adhere to the values and culture of the place we left? Why do we not assimilate into the local Canadian culture?

Most of the people I have spoken with respond with the cliché: "You can take a person out of Israel, but you cannot take Israel out of a person."

The fact that we left Israel for personal reasons does not mean we oppose what Israel represents. Israel is a part of us, we are a part of Israel, and it will always be so. There are many good things about Israel, and we wish to preserve them, and transfer it to our children. In addition, the vast majority of Israelis abroad have close relatives in Israel, as well as friends they have known for years.

A child born to Israeli parents living in Canada will likely be "wrapped" in an Israeli atmosphere. His native language will be Hebrew. He will know the Jewish holidays and special dates in the modern Israeli calendar. He may find himself in an Israeli daycare where Hebrew is spoken by the staff and the children.

Rediscovering Shabbat dinner in London, England

Michelle Bitran
Special to The CJN

When I arrived in London, England almost eight months ago to begin my semester studying abroad, I never thought that one of the most memorable experiences I would walk away with would be a Shabbat dinner.

I spent the first frosty weeks in January adjusting to the journalism program at my host university, wandering the streets of London, admiring the impressive architecture and enjoying the novelty of the British accent. It wasn't until after my parents visited me, three weeks into my journey, that I started to feel something was missing.

Though I attended Hebrew day school at home in Toronto, my family was never particularly observant. However, the Jewish tradition we never missed was the weekly Shabbat dinner. To me, these dinners felt more like a big family gathering, a chance to catch up with my cousins, rather than a religious observance. And so, when I went to London, I didn't expect to miss the tradition itself in addition to my family. But that is where I was wrong.

Seeing my parents brought a little piece of home to London, and when they left, I wanted to keep that familiar presence with me. I decided to look for a Shabbat dinner to attend in London. I started with the Jewish student group on my campus, since I was hoping to meet other Jewish youth in the area and make new friends.

Three unanswered e-mails later, I realized that the Jewish student group was either not as active or not as inviting as I had hoped. A bit crushed over my failed attempt, I mentioned my experience in passing to a fellow exchange student from Australia. And it was she who turned everything around.

My friend is not Jewish, but she lives in a very Jewish area in Melbourne and has celebrated Shabbat and other Jewish holidays with her friends and their families. When she heard about my Shabbat dinner dilemma, she was determined to solve it. She began organizing a potluck Shabbat dinner at her apartment for all the exchange students, among whom there were only three Jews, myself included.

Her enthusiasm and knowledge about Shabbat shocked me. "Do you know where to get challah in London?" she asked me. I nodded, only half sure, and she gave me the job of finding it. "Don't worry about the rest."

So the next Friday, I left class early and made my way over to the only bakery in east London that I suspected would have a loaf of challah on the shelf. When I got to my friend's apartment that evening, I could hardly believe my eyes.

About 12 friends had gathered, each with a dish of their own. The table overflowed with chicken, potatoes, pasta and salad. There were even tea light candles set up and ready for the brachah. The boys had been instructed to bring hats to use as kippot, and the girls were dressed in some of their best clothes. For most, it was their first Shabbat dinner - some had never even heard of Shabbat before, but they were all eager to learn.

As I stood up and covered my eyes to bless the candles, all I could think about was how beautiful and unique this Shabbat dinner was. I was surrounded by open-minded friends who wanted to share my traditions. While this potluck dinner did not look like any Shabbat dinner I've ever been to, it brought us together and taught us to enjoy and respect our different customs.

That Shabbat dinner made me realize that, sometimes, old traditions can be renewed in the most unexpected ways. It made me proud to share and celebrate my heritage. And it certainly got a few of my friends hooked on the sweet treat of challah.

Culture shock in Vancouver

Korrine Shefa
Special to The CJN

Growing up in one of the most Jewish neighbourhoods in the country, Thornhill, Ont., I'm sure there are countless experiences I have in common with most of the Jewish community there.

Most of us are walking distance from a synagogue, a bagel shop and a Hebrew day school. Most of us have also been to the Richmond Hill SilverCity movie theatre on its busiest day – Christmas.

Most of us have heard bickering Israelis – who despite being part of the largest Israeli population in the country, think no one could possibly understand their secret language – complain about you in Hebrew right in front of you.

Having spent most of my life in Thornhill's Jewish bubble – a stone's throw from the Promenade Mall where my visits usually consisted of trying to avoid the inevitable, awkward small talk with my parents' friends at the Aroma café – I welcomed an opportunity to move away from the nearly 200,000 strong Jewish population in the Greater Toronto Area and all the clichés that come with it.

It's been a year since I moved to Vancouver to pursue a master's degree in psychology, and "spread my wings."

But I now realize how much I took my Jewish bubble for granted.

Not to say that Vancouver doesn't have a Jewish population. According to the Jewish Agency for Israel, Vancouver boasts the third largest community in Canada, with a population of about 30,000. But compared to what I'm used to in Toronto, the Jews here seem like an endangered species.

I've been living in downtown Vancouver since August 2010 and I have yet to see one mezuzah. During Chanukah, I saw no menorahs proudly marking the holiday, and while I'm sure there has to be a kosher-style deli around here somewhere, I haven't found one yet.

I debated getting involved with the Vancouver Hillel, and although I'm on their monthly "News for Jews" e-mail list, the events are usually a far commute from where I live. And as a 26-year-old, I'm not too keen on hanging out with freshmen 7 to 8 years my junior.

When I spent Rosh Hashanah in Vancouver, away from my family, I started to really feel homesick.

There I was at the grocery store buying apples and overpriced honey ($8! Really!?), and then I went home to sit in my room, alone, dipping my apple in the honey. (Insert single rolling tear here.)

That's when it occurred to me: Where am I going to find Jewish boys to date?

Uh-oh.

One of my girlfriends came up with a great idea to keep me from spending my two years at grad school as a reluctant shomeret nègiah, someone who avoids physical contact prior to marriage.

She suggested I Google the nearest Israeli restaurant and hang out there to casually scope out the scene and maybe "accidentally" bump into some young, eligible boy my mother would be happy to meet. I agreed.

Although I was fully aware of how hilariously pathetic this mission was, I was disappointed to see that all the falafel huts and shawarma joints were Lebanese owned – not exactly what I had in mind. Mission 1, failed.

That's when I caved. I had no other choice. I had to turn to JDate. Now, I'm not going to pretend that I have never ventured onto the site before. Like many, I've dabbled with the online Jewish dating site, but after a few disastrous (if not hilarious) experiences I'd given up that route to find love.

I do remember however, that when searching for potential mates in the GTA, I had thousands of profiles to choose from.

I sat in front of my computer, updated my profile with my new city and postal code, and searched for matches in the Vancouver area.

Korrine Shefa

I had 15 profiles to choose from.

Fifteen.

One awkward date later, with a gentleman who told me that my outfit looked fabulous, I had all but given up.

Riding the SkyTrain, Vancouver's subway system, one evening, I heard something I hadn't heard since I moved to Vancouver: Hebrew.

Never before has the guttural "ccchhhh" sound sounded so beautiful.

In Toronto, this would never faze me, but that night, my head snapped up as I examined the passengers around me. By the time I located him (and yes, he was cute) he had walked off the train.

Telling a friend about the lone, mystery Israeli, my friend encouraged me to ride the same train at the same time each day until I ran into him again.

But even if I made that desperate effort, what would I say if I ever saw him again?

"Hi! I'm a Jew, too!" Or, "Can I hang out with you and your friends?"

What about, "What are your plans for Passover? Eating matzah sucks, eh?"

When I flew home to spend Passover with my family, I drove around Thornhill and realized how much I missed my Jewish community and how comforting it was to be surrounded by people who grew up sharing the same experiences. Never again will I take that for granted.

Ex-nurse becomes hospital chaplain

Jenny Libman
Special to The CJN

Rabbi Rena Arshinoff is proof that it is never too late to change your life. In 2003, after more than 20 years of working in nursing and epidemiological research, she made the decision to apply to rabbinical school.

"As a mother of three children, and as someone with an established career, this was a huge decision," said Rabbi Arshinoff. "It was not easy, but I knew it was what I was meant to do."

Rabbi Arshinoff grew up in a traditionally Jewish home in Montreal. "We observed all the Jewish holidays, and I went to Yiddish classes after school, but becoming a rabbi was never something I considered – my spirituality came much later in life." Rabbi Arshinoff moved to Toronto in 1980 to study epidemiology at the University of Toronto.

It was in 2000, while saying kaddish for her father, that Judaism began playing a larger role in Rabbi Arshinoff's life. "I was becoming more involved in the synagogue, I learned all the prayers, and I began to see the Torah as something very important to me. Initially, I thought that when my year of mourning was complete I would return to my previous life, but something changed and I wasn't able to go back."

Rabbi Rena Arshinoff

In 2001, at age 48, Rabbi Arshinoff decided to have an adult bat mitzvah – something she hadn't considered while growing up in Montreal. "At this point, many people were telling me that I should become a rabbi, but I would just laugh. I wasn't ready to seriously consider it."

Later that year, a chaplain at Humber River Regional Hospital, where the rabbi was doing research, told her that she would become a rabbi. "She told me that one day I would just know it was the right thing to do – and she was absolutely right."

In 2003, Rabbi Arshinoff entered rabbinical school. She spent a year studying in Israel followed by four years in Cincinnati. After becoming ordained in 2008, she spent an additional year training in hospital chaplaincy. "This was a chance for me to combine my background in health care with my new identity as a rabbi."

In February of this year, Rabbi Arshinoff obtained a specialist certification from the Canadian Association for Spiritual Care (CASC). She is the second rabbi in Canada to hold this designation, and the first female and Reform rabbi.

Currently, Rabbi Arshinoff works at Toronto Western Hospital as the staff spiritual care professional with the neuroscience program, where she supports and counsels patients and their families, as well as hospital staff, through difficult experiences.

"A lot of my work is giving patients the opportunity to talk about their difficult circumstances. Many people are uncomfortable with others' grief because it brings out their own fears. I step in as someone removed from the situation."

At Toronto Western, Rabbi Arshinoff works with patients of all faiths, not just those who are Jewish. "People in hospitals are vulnerable and frightened, and this is true across all religions. I provide care that is spirituality-based rather than faith-based."

The rabbi also gives the patients' families the opportunity to talk to her. "In a sense, it makes me an ambassador for Judaism, because it allows to me to take the Jewish mitzvot, and apply [them] to people of all backgrounds."

In addition to counselling patients and their families, Rabbi Arshinoff also provides support to the staff of the Toronto Western neuroscience program. "Health-care workers, especially nurses, work in very demanding and emotionally and spiritually draining areas. They work with patients that have difficult diagnoses that are very painful to witness. As a nurse myself, I understand the pressure they work under. I hold regular reflection groups with them, debriefing and discussing the issues they are facing." She also works with Bereaved Families of Ontario, Jewish Family & Child, and leads services at Baycrest. As well, she officiates at life-cycle events on a freelance basis.

"It's so amazing to me to see all the different opportunities that are now available to me. I'm not sure what my career will look like 10 years from now, but I know that it is going to be a very interesting road."

An identity 'paradox' for Israelis in Canada

When an Israeli child reaches school age, his parents may send him to a Jewish day school. In Toronto, he may attend Kachol Lavan, the Israeli supplementary school, be a member of the Israeli Scouts, listen to Israeli music, watch TV shows in Hebrew, read Hebrew books and Hebrew-language news.

Are Israelis different in their behavior than immigrants from China, India or Africa? Probably not. Many immigrant communities balance dual identities. The homeland identity is preserved, and it can even intensify in order to add confidence and strengthen the sense of belonging, even as a Canadian identity is being created.

The multi-cultural ethos of Canada supports and legitimizes the preservation of the Israeli identity. Canada consists of many different cultural "nations." Canada is an open society with freedom of speech. This is a comfortable infrastructure for the flourishing of "Little Israel," especially north of Steeles.

Last week I took my younger son to one of Thornhill Woods' playgrounds. While sitting on a bench and watching him play, I listened to random conversations of other parents. I heard only Hebrew, and the topics of discussion were business matters and, of course, Israel. Everyone spoke about the increasing cost of housing there as well as the "Cottage Cheese Protest."

I asked some of them about their Internet habits. The majority said that they surf Israeli news and cultural sites on the web. They listen to Israeli music and are frequently updated about what is happening in Israel. They feel that they live in Israel through the computer's screen, despite the fact that they wake up to a Canadian morning and breathe much cooler air.

On my way home from the park I listened to Israeli music and my little son joined my singing.

Is it a paradox?

It probably is. And we're doing just fine with it.

Yosef Tastassa and his family have been living in the GTA for the past year.

Sarner uses own experience

"Our time in Paris very much affected my personality," Sarner said. "We lived in the heart of Paris, and I was influenced by the French culture. I came to understand the meaning of Jewish life in the Diaspora and, of course, how to maintain a Jewish identity in the Diaspora.

"In my opinion, the way of the Jewish People in the Diaspora is to contribute to local society without losing their Jewishness. It is important that we know where we came from, who we are and no less what our destinies could be," she added. Sarner's longing for Israel, her family and especially her mother did not abate during their time in Paris. Thus, in 1990 the family returned to Israel. Their son, Etai, was born there.

In Israel, Sarner worked as a special education teacher, and she was accepted to train as a school principal. It was then that she witnessed the massive immigration waves from the former Soviet Union to Israel.

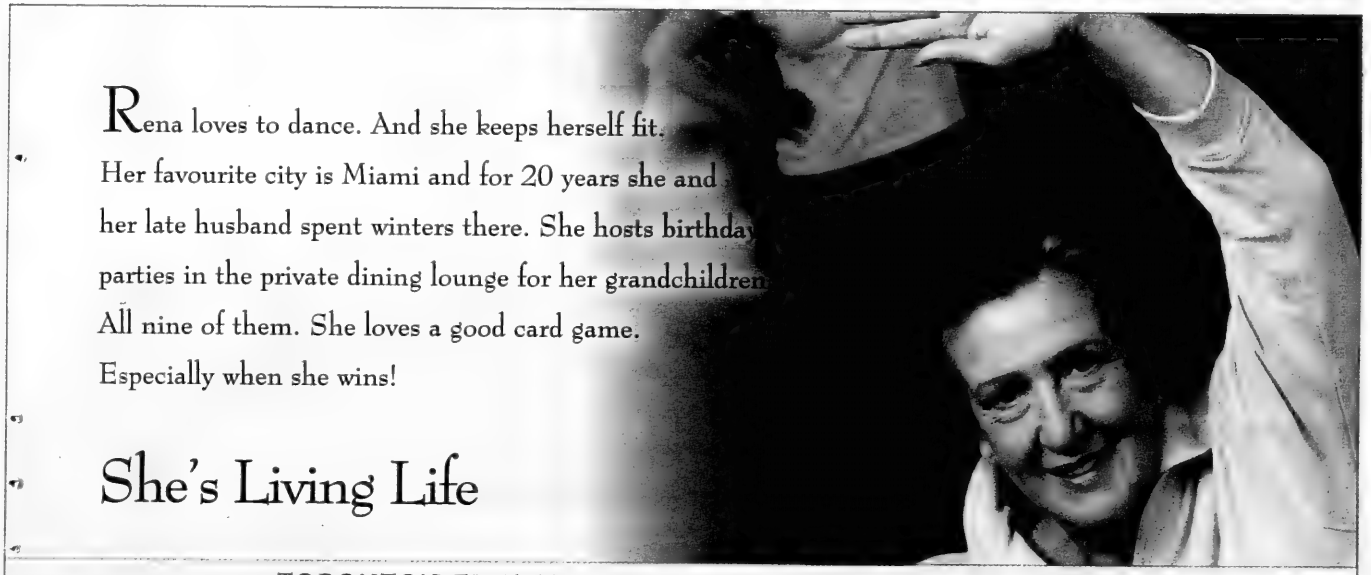
"My personal experience as an émigré in Paris, my family's immigrant experience in Israel and my research on immigrant women educators have helped me became what I am today," she said.

In 2004, Robert got a job offer in the communication business in Toronto, and they have lived in Toronto ever since. Both their daughters have served in the Israel Defence Forces, and Shani now lives in Israel.

After Sarner read a research study prepared by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto about the local Israeli community, she published an article that combined her insights about immigration from her time in Paris with parts of the conclusions of the study. The purpose of the study was to determine the educational, cultural and other needs of the Israeli community in the Toronto area and to try to establish a local program that would respond to those needs.

It was after she wrote the article that Sarner was hired by federation to try to put into practice the insights and conclusions from her own immigrant experience.

She put together a group of leaders and volunteers from the local Israeli community. The result of her work included getting Kachol-Lavan, the Israeli supplementary school, off the ground, and the creation of the Mifgash Program. The Mifgash Theatre is the only Hebrew-speaking theatre in the Toronto area. She also has significantly helped boost the Toronto-area Israeli Scouts movement.



Rena loves to dance. And she keeps herself fit.
Her favourite city is Miami and for 20 years she and her late husband spent winters there. She hosts birthday parties in the private dining lounge for her grandchildren
All nine of them. She loves a good card game.

Sixth birthday in captivity

Israelis marched toward the Erez border crossing between Israel and northern Gaza on Sunday to mark Gilad Schalit's 25th birthday. Schalit was kidnapped from his military base in southern Israel six years ago by Hamas terrorists. Negotiations for his release have not been successful. As the posters demonstrate, the people marching were also expressing their anger at the Israeli government for its inability to bring Schalit home. [Flash90 photo]

Libyan reaches out to Jewish expatriates

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The leader of the Democratic Party of Libya is inviting Jewish Libyans to return to their "homeland" and is calling Israel a role model for a future democratic state in Libya.

Ahmed Shebani said the Jewish people's 2,200-year connection to Libya "is written in the stones, and the stones don't lie.

"Although Jews were expelled cruelly [after the 1967 Six Day War] and allowed to take only one suitcase, we call on Libyan Jews to forgive Libya. Libya is your mother, and you must forgive Libya for what happened."

Shebani, a businessman and Libyan expatriate living in England, said Jews "will have the right to return to their homeland and make application for compensation for lost property and for suffering."

Shebani made the offer in a telephone interview with The CJN, arranged by Walter Arbib, a Libyan Jew who left Libya in 1967. Arbib and his family were forced to flee after mobs rioted when early propaganda reports claimed Egyptian forces were in Tel Aviv.

Ahmed Shebani

"They thought they could get rid of the Jews all over the Arab world," he said.

Despite his flight from Tripoli and the forced abandonment of several valuable properties, Arbib, a successful Toronto businessman and philanthropist, maintains an interest in Libyan affairs.

"He has been generous to the people [of Libya] in this revolution... He has given a lot of help, including logistics and medicine," Shebani said.

Group Rejoins Pride

OTTAWA — A local group of Jewish gays and lesbians made a return to Ottawa's Pride Parade this past weekend. Keshet had not marched in the parade since the late 1990s and the group had dwindled since then, but a new generation revived it, local activist Gabriella Goliger told xtra.ca.

WORLD

New Security Funds

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The U.S. Homeland Security Department will provide about $15 million in grants to Jewish communal groups and institutions considered vulnerable to attack. The Aug. 23 announcement marked the sixth instalment of the department's Nonprofit Security Grant Program. Since its inception in 2005, $118 million has been distributed to non-profits to help fund video surveillance, blast-proof windows and promote security-related preparedness. On Aug. 23, Homeland Security announced $19 million in new grants, 80 per cent of which will go to Jewish institutions. The Jewish Federations of North America praised the announcement.

Oz Pulls Out

SYDNEY — Australia has withdrawn from next month's United Nations conference on racism in New York over concerns of Israel-bashing. The Labour government wasn't convinced that "unbalanced criticism of Israel and the airing of antisemitic views" would be avoided, and therefore withdrew, it said. The event has been dubbed "Durban III" after the original anti-racism conference in South Africa in 2001 that was marred by antisemitism, prompting Australia, among other western nations, to walk out. The Labour government subsequently boycotted the second conference in 2009, where Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad unleashed a vitriolic attack on Israel and the Jews. Australia joins the United States, Canada, Italy, the Czech Republic, the Netherlands and Israel in boycotting this year's event.

Libyan Jew Says Rebels Invited Him To Run

LONDON — The leader of the Libyan-Jewish community in Britain said that he has been invited to run for political office in post-Muammar Gadhafi Libya.

Raphael Luzon told the Jerusalem Post Aug. 23, a day after the fall of the Libyan capital Tripoli to rebel forces, that opposition leader Mustafa Abdul Jalil has asked him to return to Libya and run in free elections.

Raphael Luzon

Jalil is a former Libyan justice minister and now chairman of the rebel council in Benghazi.

Luzon told the newspaper that he was invited to take part in the elections "because they would like it to be open to all people, including women and Jews."

Luzon, whose family fled Libya in 1967, met Gadhafi twice in recent years.

He said he would await further developments in the country before making a decision. He told the Post that reconstruction of the war-torn country and the restitution of Jewish assets confiscated by the Libyan regime would top his political agenda.

War Archivist Dies

WARSAW — Historian Ruta Sakowska, one of the world's leading experts on the Warsaw Ghetto, died Aug. 22 in Warsaw at age 89. Born in Vilnius in 1922, she was director of the Ringelblum Archives of the Jewish Historical Institute in Warsaw. The archives, established clandestinely in the Warsaw Ghetto by historian Emmanuel Ringelblum and his secret Oneg Shabbat resistance team, document every facet of life in the ghetto and document the fate of other Polish Jewish communities. The archive was hidden on the eve of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising in 1943. Some 25,000 pages of material were recovered from the ruins of the ghetto after the war. Ringelblum was killed by the Gestapo in 1944. In 1997, Sakowska received the Jan Karski and Pola Nirenska Award for her work on the archives.

Use of kosher food bank on the rise

Ellin Bessner
Special to The CJN

The doors to the kosher food bank at Pride of Israel Synagogue don't open until 10 a.m., but by 8:30 on a Wednesday morning last month, Valerian Voinov had already arrived to reserve his place in line.

Voinov, 76, is a former Russian scientist who moved to Toronto from Israel nine years ago. Since then, Voinov said, he has been unable to find work in his field, which was designing equipment for Israeli cardiologists.

"This [food bank] is very good because they help and support all of these people," he said, pointing to a small group of regulars who are also early birds. Most, like him are Russian speaking.

Voinov is among the 130 to 150 people who come to the kosher food bank every Wednesday.

There are other places where Toronto's Jewish poor can find food or a free meal, but this is the only one operating year round where they can get strictly kosher groceries.

Clients aren't asked if they are Jewish, but they need to show papers to prove they are on government assistance.

The contents of the grocery bags vary, depending on what the Jewish food bank's main supplier, the Salvation Army, delivers during the week.

Food bank volunteer Helen Winer said that donations from the "Sally Ann" started in December 2010, thanks to a bequest to the Salvation Army in the will of a Jewish benefactor.

"It'll be a year in December that they've been giving, so for a whole year, we've saved money," she said.

The unlikely match between the Salvation Army and low-income Jews was made thanks to some behind-the-scenes steering of the bequest by the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, UJA spokesperson Steven Shulman said.

"This is how we create capacity in the community," Shulman said in an interview, explaining why UJA doesn't directly supply groceries to the food bank.

Israel's realist think-tank

The Perspectives essay in this week's edition of The CJN is written by Professor Efraim Inbar, the irrepressible, straight-shooting, very forthright director of the Begin-Sadat (BESA) Center for Strategic Studies at Bar-Ilan University in Israel.

Inbar writes about the tactic coming up later this month by the Palestinian Authority (PA) to gain UN General Assembly approval for an independent Palestinian state. Typical of his straight-ahead, no-words-minced approach to policy analysis, Inbar writes: "The UN cannot deliver a state. It can neither change the facts on the ground, nor Palestinian behaviour."

According to Inbar, the Palestinians suffer and have always suffered from "failed leadership" who have squandered realistically viable moments to achieve their own state, most recently in 1948 and 1993.

Despite the high-sounding publicity it would generate, Inbar points out that a unilateral declaration of statehood by the PA would actually set further back the Palestinians' aspirations for an independent state.

There would be a high risk of new violence between the peoples, engendering further mutual distrust and animosity. But more importantly, Israel would likely withdraw from many of the pragmatic arrangements on the ground that assist and prop up the PA regime in the West Bank.

"The power differential between a democratic, prosperous and militarily strong Israel and the corrupt, autocratic and fragmented Palestinians is only growing."

Inbar's bold, assertive manner is somewhat of an insignia for and the hallmark of the centre of which he is the director. Its mission statement is a minimalist declaration of explicitly clear detail. It advances "a realist, conservative and staunchly Zionist agenda in the search for security and peace for Israel."

Canadians have been instrumental in the centre's existence ever since its founding 18 years ago.

The founder of the centre and the chairman of its board is Tom Hecht from Montreal. He was instrumental in giving life to the centre from its original conceptual idea.

Helping to give that idea a significant and weighty presence have been Saul and Mira Koschitzky of Toronto, whose ongoing support enabled the centre to construct and dedicate a new building on the Bar-Ilan campus.

The BESA Center has gained wide respectability for the breadth of its analytical work and for the plain-speaking nature of that work. Over the past 18 years, it has published numerous research and policy papers, symposia collections and books; has organized and run more than 300 conferences, seminars and symposia, and partnered with leading strategic studies centres in the United States and Europe.

The expertise of the BESA scholars extends across a wide range of subjects related to the myriad aspects of strategic considerations in the Middle East. (CJN columnist Gerald Steinberg is a member of its faculty.)

From the editor's desk...

Last spring, during my visit to Israel, I spent a head-spinning, thoroughly intellectually stimulating day at the centre on the Bar-Ilan campus.

I met privately for almost an hour each with six different fellows with the centre – six rather intense seminars, as it were, with an exceptionally eclectic group of scholars.

First and foremost, I was impressed with the substantive depth of each of the individuals with whom I met and conversed. Although, truth be told, I listened and took notes far more than I conversed. But I was also struck by the wide diversity of their learning and how utterly uncategorizable they were as a group in terms of their respective backgrounds and the heterodoxy of their thinking.

For example, to name only a few of my teachers that day, Ze'ev Maghen is an expert on Iran, the Shi'a religion and Islam and Persian Gulf politics. In addition to English and Hebrew, he speaks Arabic, Persian, Russian and Turkish. Maghen settled in Israel many years ago after moving from Philadelphia. (His most recent book, by the way, is a missive in another equally important strategic battle, namely the battle for the hearts, minds and souls of young Jewish people. It's called John Lennon and The Jews: A Philosophical Rampage.)

Jonathan Rynhold is an expert on Israeli diplomacy, U.S.-Israeli relations and Middle East-Far East relations. He settled in Israel from London.

Yoaz Hendel is a sabra. He was born in Israel and served for six years in the IDF's elite navy seals commando unit. He is an expert on military history and national security matters. He was recently appointed as chief media adviser in the Prime Minister's Office.

Next week, a little bit more about BESA.

VOIGHT VISITS

Academy Award-winning actor Jon Voight, left, visited Soroka Hospital in Be'er Sheva last week in an effort to cheer up some of the victims of the recent terror attacks near Eilat. Voight, the father of actor Angelina Jolie, is a longtime friend of the state. Voight told the victims that he was deeply saddened by the attacks and that Israel needed its friends at this time. "The U.S. should be Israel's best friend," he said, adding that one of the aims of his visit was to report back on the situation to the American public.

Israel must reform its economy: think-tank

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

With a social protest movement sweeping across and gaining ground in Israel, an Israeli think-tank has released a report urging Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to articulate a new set of principles for economic growth.

Shirlee Harel

The Reut Institute, a nonpartisan policy organization based in Tel Aviv, recently unveiled a set of proposals designed to defuse tensions.

The document, New Social Contract for Growth, Inclusiveness and Community Building, is intended to stimulate debate and engender change.

Shirlee Harel, the institute's director of development, will be in Toronto this week to discuss the protests that have prompted Israelis to take to the streets and set up tent cities.

"After two decades of growth based on a totally free market approach, mixed with deep privatization that caused extreme social gaps leading to tremendous pressure on Israel's middle class, a spark was lit in Israeli society," said Harel, who will be accompanied by Martin Ben-Moreh, the institute's director of Judaism and Renewed Zionism.

In recent weeks, tens of thousands of Israeli demonstrators have called for the gap between rich and poor to be narrowed, complained about the high cost of living and unaffordable rents and questioned the government's spending priorities.

Responding to their complaints, Netanyahu has promised to ease the burden on ordinary Israelis and has appointed a panel to study the problem.

Harel, a 28-year-old graduate of York University and McGill University who made aliyah three years ago, said the institute has taken a leading role in responding to the wave of protests that have convulsed Israel in the past month.

The current malaise stems from Israel's decision in 1985 to stabilize its economy, she suggested.

"The current economic approach spawned many achievements but also created complex problems. It is rooted in the values of liberalism and capitalism and based on the principles of the market economy," she said.

On the one hand, Israel extricated itself from an economic crisis that lasted from 1974 to 1985, returning to a path of growth and fiscal stability.

On the other hand, she added, this policy led to gaps in society, eroded the middle class and enlarged the circle of poverty.

"For the past 25 years, Israel's economic growth has not benefited the majority of its citizens. Despite its significant achievements, Israel has become a more divided society, both socially and economically. It is these divisions that fuelled the outburst of public protests in recent weeks. Growth that does not include all citizens is explosive."

She added, "Children are the silent victims of this reality. The growing financial challenges of many households and the erosion of public services compromise the education, health and future assets of Israel's future generations."

Harel said that the purpose of the New Social Contract is to promote high and inclusive growth so that Israel becomes one of the 15 leading countries in terms of quality of life.

If properly implemented, the New Social Contract would serve as a force for good, defuse tension and offer Israelis a unifying vision, she added.

Harel said the government should increase real disposable income by decreasing the cost of basic products and services and increasing productivity.

The government should also integrate Israeli Arabs and haredim into the work force, reform tax policy and encourage the accumulation of capital through pensions, home ownership and long-term savings.

Israel's woes are exacerbated by a number of factors, Harel said.

She mentioned the security burden, the disproportionate power of groups such as the haredim and settlers, and the monopolistic positions attained by corporations and tycoons.

And while the high-tech sector has been an engine for growth, it has also increased societal gaps and failed to contribute to overall national productivity and create new jobs in recent years.

The key to bridging the gap between rich and poor, she pointed out, is to ensure that everyone has a fair chance to take part in growth and enjoy its fruits.

"The Israeli economic and social system must change," she said.

Ontarians head to the polls October 6

The CJN to talk with candidates, leaders

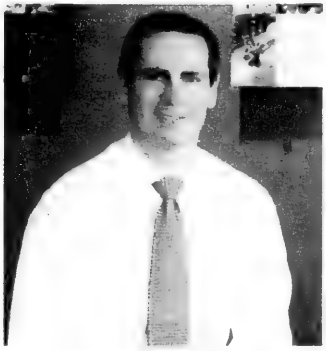
Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

On Thursday, Oct. 6, Ontarians will head to the polls to vote for their next provincial government.

Beginning with the next issue, The CJN will cover the run-up to the vote with a series of riding and candidate profiles, including coverage of what is shaping up to be a major battleground in the electoral district of Thornhill, where popular Conservative incumbent and former broadcaster Peter Shurman will be challenged by former Canadian Jewish Congress CEO turned Liberal candidate Bernie Farber.

The paper will also cover races in the ridings of Eglinton-Lawrence, St. Paul's, Willowdale and York Centre and is lining up interviews with the major party leaders.

Of interest to voters this year are amendments to the province's Election Act made after the 2007 provincial election that give people increased flexibility to vote in advance of the Oct. 6 election.



Dalton McGuinty, Liberal

As of Sept. 7, voters can apply for a special ballot to either vote by mail or in person at any time during the 28 days of the election period, or apply for a home visit by a Special Ballot Officer.

The latter service is intended to assist housebound voters who find it "impossible or unreasonably difficult to go to the returning office" or "need assistance because of a disability or because he or she is unable to read or write," according to the Elections Ontario website.

Seinfeld star helps launch UJA campaign

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

As of last week's campaign launch, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto had already raised $7.8 million, Gilbert Palter, UJA Campaign 2012 co-chair with Barbara Bank, announced at the event.

But in an unusual move, Palter did not announce a campaign dollar goal at the launch, held Aug. 23 at the Sony Centre. An audience of almost 2,000 people filled the theatre, where Jason Alexander – George Costanza of Seinfeld fame – was the featured guest.

Rather than naming a fundraising goal, as UJA has in the past, Palter focused on the importance of the campaign in addressing social welfare needs such as poverty in the Jewish community.

"Our goal for Campaign 2012 is to have every Jew in Toronto understand how important UJA is to all our Jewish lives," he said. "Every single gift and every single dollar really does make a difference."

Bank announced that UJA has set up a "challenge fund" that will match any new gift or 100 per cent increase over last year. (The money will come from leading donors, a campaign official told The CJN.)

Palter spoke of how UJA funds help Toronto's Jewish community care for its vulnerable members, foster youngsters' Jewish identity, and advocate for itself and for Israel.

Felicia Posluns, UJA's women's philanthropy chair, announced her division's goal of raising at least $10 million.

Steven Shulman, UJA Federation's campaign director and counsel, told The CJN two days after the launch, "We didn't want to say what the goal [for the larger campaign] was."

Instead, he said, "Our big focus is awareness about the primacy of the UJA campaign for Jewish Toronto… We believe that if we expand the number of donors, we're going to increase the number of dollars."

At last year's campaign launch, held the same time of year as this summer's event, UJA had raised $15.5 million, about twice as much as the initial pledges announced this year. The previous year's initial pledges were similar, totalling $16 million.

The 2011 campaign goal, announced at last year's launch, was $2.5 million beyond the $64 million raised the previous year. It ended up raising $63 million.

Because of the lower total, the federation has been trimming its overhead, president and CEO Ted Sokolsky told The CJN in an interview earlier this summer. He added at the time that the past few years have been challenging for all philanthropies and that Toronto's federation is "fortunate to hold [its] own."

The success of this year's campaign is "absolutely vital for the future of our community," Laurel Linetsky-Fleisher, launch co-chair with David Cynamon, said at the event.

Amir Gissin, Israel's consul general for Toronto and western Canada, thanked Toronto's Jewish community for its commitment to Eilat even before the recent series of terror attacks in the area. "Israel, as strong as it is… is under a lot of pressure," he said.

Eilat/Eilot is a partner community of UJA Federation, Bank noted.

"These attacks have hit home in a very personal way for Toronto," said Elizabeth Wolfe, UJA Federation's chair of the board.

She added that UJA has spearheaded a project to renovate Eilat's Joseftal Hospital and build a new emergency wing there.

Representatives of the shinshinim (UJA young emissaries from Israel to Toronto) recited prayers for the recovery of those injured in the terror attacks, as well as for captured IDF soldier Gilad Schalit.

Alexander – who also appeared two nights later at Federation CJA's campaign launch in Montreal – was interviewed by Hockey Night in Canada commentator Elliotte Friedman.

"Shalom, and sheket bevakashah," Alexander said by way of greeting, adding that his Hebrew teacher always repeated that phrase.

The 29-years-married father of two said he met his wife, Daena Title, when he was a struggling actor and the "office flunkey" in a New York casting office in 1980. "She was way out of my league," he recalled.

Alexander – who won a Tony Award in 1989 and was nominated for or won a dozen television awards for his portrayal of Costanza – said that the hugely popular sitcom, which ran for nine seasons, almost didn't make it to air. A pilot episode received "the worst" test scores, including comments that it wasn't funny.

"We were let out of our contracts," he said.

But NBC reconsidered after an "amazing" TV Guide review, and committed to an initial four episodes.

Alexander said it took him a while to realize that "George was Larry David [co-creator of Seinfeld, and more recently creator of Curb Your Enthusiasm]. George was notorious for lying his way out of any pickle."

Although his work on Seinfeld was "tremendous fun," Alexander said there was one episode that he almost refused to take part in, recalling his reservations about the "irresponsible portrayal" of a mohel as "a child-hating guy with a twitch," in The Bris.

"I went to Larry and said 'I'm out, I won't be a part of this.'

"He said, 'Come on, it's funny.'"

Alexander, who said he "love[s] Larry to death," agreed that it was funny but told David it was the only thing he'd done that was wrong. It was only after David "softened it" that Alexander agreed to go ahead.

Menacing obsession

It's always good when a government unambiguously articulates its polices. This enables the people affected by those policies, and other governments as well, to make informed decisions regarding those policies and the government espousing them on the basis of clear information and certainty of expectations.

Thus, we point out with intensified disgust the consistency of the president of Iran's dark, hateful and menacing obsession toward the State of Israel. In an interview with Lebanon's Al-Manar television network last week, he said, "Iran believes that whoever is for humanity should also be for eradicating the Zionist regime as a symbol of suppression and discrimination."

To drive home the point that he was expressing formal state policy, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad added: "Iran follows this issue [the eradication of Israel] with determination and decisiveness and will never ever withdraw from this standpoint and policy" (emphasis added).

The assiduous arming and nourishing of its surrogates – Hamas, Hezbollah and the Alawite rulers of the Assad clan – to surround the Jewish state is stark evidence of Ahmadinejad's macabre loyalty to his ghoulish policy.

Whoever defends Iran's policies or rails against or obstructs western efforts to rein in its nuclear program, is defending and abetting an openly cultivated national policy of genocide. No one should scoff at the seriousness of Ahmadinejad's intentions. He is a threat not only to Israel but to world peace. Iran should be thrown out of the assembly of the United Nations, shunned, scorned and its evil obsession thwarted.

Jack Layton

The stunning suddenness of Jack Layton's death added to the melancholy of the country's loss. The NDP leader's final, palliative-care sick bed became his own Mount Nebo from which he would only imagine the landscape of the better country that he had striven his entire life to help create. He had raised up his party to a newer, more onerous, more responsible role in the governance of Canada, but was, alas, "forbidden" from leading them even higher in the House of Commons.

In announcing the establishment of the Jack Layton Scholarship for Social Justice, David Koschitzky, chair of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, described Layton as "a lifelong fighter for many causes dear to Canada's Jewish community." B'nai Brith Canada eulogized Layton as "a man of integrity."

We share these sentiments and, in the words of Koschitzky, we "join with all Canadians in honouring the passing of a passionate advocate and pillar of our Parliament."

Jewish education before new JCCs

Letter writer Louis Train makes a specious argument when he opposes Rabbi Erwin Schild's criticism of our community leaders for their failure to make decisions that are in the best interests of our community ("The new JCC building," Aug. 25). Train argues that "were we to base all of our charitable decisions on which cause needed the money most, few would continue to contribute to any worthy organizations," because donors, in Train's view, make decisions on the basis of passion, not utility. Why should that be the case? Perhaps donors make misguided decisions because our community leaders have failed to make the argument that Jewish education, and not expensive and ornate edifices, is what in fact is essential to ensure Jewish continuity. We need affordable Jewish education, not empty lots waiting for "new and improved" Jewish community centres to ensure this continuity. A cursory look at our neighbours to the south will reveal what we may face one day if this trend continues – that is, Jewish community centres without Jews.

Land confiscated in West Bank

The Civil Administration of Israel recently used antiquated Ottoman law from 1858 to take over uncultivated land in the Palestinian village of Karyut. As a Canadian Jew who identifies as a Zionist, I am embarrassed and disappointed. Observers say that this action has the effect of legalizing the Jewish settlement Hayovel.

The action contravenes promises made by previous Israeli prime ministers Ariel Sharon and Ehud Olmert to then-U.S. president George W. Bush in 2004. Further, it ignores the report by Israeli attorney Talia Sasson stating that Hayovel was built on private Palestinian land.

As a Canadian, I have a nightmare of expropriation of Canada's magnificent wilderness by New York State, with the justification that Canada is not cultivating it. Fallow and uncultivated land has many purposes in nature.

I would not like another people to tell me what I must do with Canadian land. Why does our beloved government of Israel pursue actions that give its critics reason to say that Israel does not keep its word? Can Diaspora Jews defend the actions of a government that first builds illegal settlements and follows up with land expansion? Such actions put Israel in the role of "delegitimizing" itself. I would like to be able to speak up for an Israel that has a strong view of itself while respecting the aspirations of its Palestinian neighbours. When will Israel stop giving material to its critics?

The British Mandate

The West Bank was never "recognized under the British Mandate as part of a future Jewish state by the international community" ("Tolerance (1)," letter, Aug. 25). Incorporating wording from the Balfour Declaration, the mandate designated Palestine as "a national home for the Jewish people" without specifying Jewish statehood, noting "that nothing should be done which might prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine." The area east of the Jordan River effectively became a separately administered British Mandate. And while mandate rules required consultation with inhabitants so that "the wishes of these communities must be a principal consideration," this was never done in Palestine, nor did the Yishuv leadership want it. Even at the time of the United Nations General Assembly's 1947 vote on partition, Palestine's Jewish population amounted to no more than one-third of its inhabitants.

Camp Gesher

I was surprised to read the column "Casa Hillel kids come to Canada" (Aug. 18), by Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, about the Casa Hillel Guatemalan kids who attended Camp Gesher on Skootamata Lake this summer during my second year there. Within this heimish camp of the Habonim Dror movement, I befriended Ardonie, Lorena, Grace, Jose, Gina and Ishmel, and every day I would expect to hear "Ola senor!" with a strong handshake. I found them to be not only appreciative of this Jewish camp, but also mature, kind and open-minded. I'll cherish my memories with them, laughing and doing my Michael Jackson dance moves at Saturday-night parties.

Palestinians' UN plan won't succeed

Efraim Inbar

Earlier this year, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas made the decision to cut off the PA's negotiations with Israel and go to the United Nations in September to bid for state recognition. There, a U.S. veto at the UN Security Council is expected, while in the UN General Assembly (GA), a large majority of its members are likely to endorse a motion recognizing a Palestinian state within the 1967 borders. While such a resolution is not binding according to international law, its prospects have elicited negative reactions from Israel, the United States and parts of the international community who deplore the Palestinian unilateral approach and fear the consequences of UN approval. Israel's defence minister, Ehud Barak, has even warned of an impending "diplomatic tsunami."

These fears are greatly exaggerated. First, the UN lacks legitimacy, as it is a morally bankrupt institution that gives an equal voice to the worst aggressors and human rights offenders on the globe. It is unclear how a resolution by such a powerless institution could possibly make a dent in a century-old ethnic conflict in the Holy Land. What can the UN actually do to implement the GA recommendations? The outcome will certainly be negative, reinforcing Palestinian intransigence.

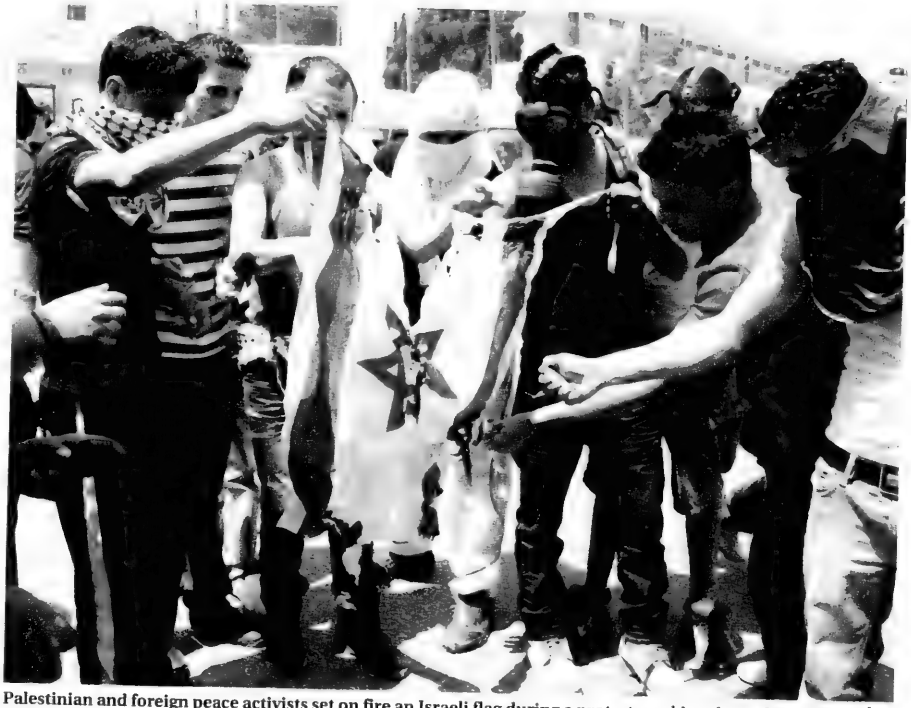
Unfortunately, GA resolutions cannot fix the Palestinian national movement, which is hopelessly fractured and dysfunctional. The UN cannot turn the Palestinian factions into one political entity. Can the UN bring Gaza and the West Bank together to present reasonable interlocutors for Israeli negotiators? Can the UN mellow the Hamas lust to kill Jews and to eradicate Israel? Can it cure the Palestinians of the shaheed death culture?

Is the UN in a position to infuse pragmatism into Palestinian political culture? The Palestinians still insist on the invented "right of return" for Palestinian refugees, which most of the world sees as an unrealistic demand and a huge obstacle to peace. The Palestinians are trying to rewrite history by denying Jewish history in Jerusalem. They are still not ready to concede that they lost the struggle over Jerusalem, a united capital city, which the Jews will adamantly defend. Israel is unquestionably stronger, and time is on its side. Nevertheless, the Palestinians remain "bad losers," not willing to make a pragmatic deal in order to achieve statehood.

Prof. Efraim Inbar

The UN cannot deliver a state. It can neither change the facts on the ground, nor Palestinian behaviour. The Palestinians had two historic opportunities to build a state, in 1948 and again in 1993, but both opportunities were squandered by failed leadership. Recently, we have observed somewhat more successful efforts at state building by PA Prime Minister Salam Fayyad. While he is arguably the best thing that has happened to the Palestinians in their short history, his popularity among his people is quite low, indicating the dysfunctional character of Palestinian politics. The images of a blooming Ramallah, the fruits of Fayyad's efforts, are misleading.

Can the PA survive without begging for international support every few months? Can it survive cutting down its bloated and corrupt bureaucracy as a prerequisite for building a healthy economy? The much-lauded U.S.-trained Palestinian troops have yet to meet the real test in the main mission of state building – a monopoly over the use of force. The current abundance of illegal weapons poses an extraordinary domestic security challenge for a nascent state. Can these troops be trusted to fight a serious challenge from Hamas, or will we see them collapse just as other U.S.-trained troops did in Gaza?



Palestinian and foreign peace activists set on fire an Israeli flag during a protest marking the 44th anniversary of the Six Days War this past June. [Flash90 photo]

Actually, regular Israeli military incursions against Hamas infrastructure in the West Bank keep the PA safe. Moreover, access to Israel's labour market, money transfers and many other services are critical to the PA's daily operations. Would statehood bring the same benefits?

The PA leadership realizes that their options vis-à-vis Israel are limited and that another terrorist campaign would turn out to be extremely destructive to the Palestinians. The power differential between a democratic, prosperous and militarily strong Israel and the corrupt, autocratic and fragmented Palestinians is only growing. Israel managed to "win" the first two intifadahs and can do so again. Now it is preparing for the Palestinians' non-violent attempt to challenge the Israeli military, which may affect Israel's image abroad and at home.

Actually, the Palestinian UN bid is an opportunity for Israeli unilateral measures such as annexation of the settlement blocs and the Jordan rift area – necessary for establishing a defensible border along the Jordan River. Furthermore, Israel can implement economic sanctions to exact a cost for the violation of the Oslo agreements, which left the decision on the nature of the Palestinian entity for final-status talks.

The main challenge to Israel, however, is not on the diplomatic front, where it is doing better than its critics think. The Arab world is in the throes of a socio-political crisis hardly able to do anything but pay lip service in support of a Palestinian state. Israel's diplomats managed to prevent an international flotilla from breaking the Gaza naval siege. Israel was also successful in procuring international understanding for its demand to be recognized by the Palestinians as a Jewish state. Furthermore, Washington is solidly behind Jerusalem on most issues, and the strategic relationship is hardly affected by differences on peace negotiations.

What is at stake, however, is Israel's social cohesion. A united Israel behind a government perceived as doing enough for securing peace will be able to sustain protracted conflict. Netanyahu's stable government meets these requirements. So far, a huge number of Israelis strongly believe that the Palestinians are not ready to make the necessary concessions for peace. A UN resolution is unlikely to change public opinion in Israel, which regards the UN as incompetent and hostile. Finally, the upheaval in the Arab world reiterates a great need for caution and for insistence on defensible borders.

Unless there emerges a more pragmatic Palestinian leadership, the conflict will continue to simmer. In all probability, September 2011 will be followed by October and many other months without a Palestinian state in the offing.

Jews must stand with First Nations

Jean M. Gerber

in Vancouver

I imagine an island. It had a thriving population that lived in a variety of settlements: some were pastoral, some great empires, some hunted and foraged, some lived off the ocean's bounty. Once invaded by an aggressive new population, they shrivelled and suffered deprivations as the new population grew and expanded into lands of the original owners.

Now imagine that you're in a boat offshore, pursued by people bent on your death, and ahead is this lovely island, where, with difficulty, you land and settle, becoming comfortable, sometimes rich. Without this island refuge you would have perished.

Question: what do you owe this island's original inhabitants?

That island is of course North America, where several million Jews found refuge. Yet its original inhabitants were displaced to make this haven.

Well, here it is, the 21st century, and we have posters like this one taken to the United Nations by representatives of those original First Nations: "Do you have running water? I don't and I live in Canada."

Or consider this: a nurse writing to the Globe and Mail this month discusses maternal health challenges in the Third World, where they don't have clean water and other basic amenities: "While we pride ourselves on the advancement western mothers enjoy, we should remember that these advancements were built on a solid foundation of healthy food, clean water, good sanitation and freedom from infectious diseases."

Sadly, you don't have to leave our shores to see Third World conditions – just go to a reserve, such as the one in Sarnia, Ont. Reserves out of the public eye can't count on these benefits. Let's do a check of conditions on many reserves.

Clean water? Nope. Healthy food? Huge levels of obesity, diabetes. Sanitation? Not without clean water and waste disposal. Freedom from disease? High rates of tuberculosis – TB in the 21st century! – maternal deaths and AIDS infections. Need I go on? Hear the dissonance?

We can do marvelous things. We can improve maternal health around the globe, yet we see this achievement shatter when it comes to isolated First Nations mothers and children.

Safe drinking water and basic sanitation are human rights affirmed by the UN, yet Canada abstained when the vote came. Recently, Jewish voters were so blissed out that the Harper government stands up at the UN for Israel that we voted in large numbers for it. Yet on the internal issue of aboriginal health, there is massive silence. Should we be part of that silence?

Those of you who read Maude Barlow's article in the July 28 Globe and Mail know of the dismal Canadian indifference to the UN affirmation of healthy conditions and our pallid government response.

This is just one of many current media reports on conditions on many reserves, where they've had to boil their water, some for years, some virtually forever.

So what are we to do? Jews from Europe found refuge in North American in the late 19th and early 20th centuries, escaping pogroms and political oppression. We grew and flourished here. Even though North America failed us in World War II, we rebounded as a people and live today in security and peace in Canada, with a strong Israel.

We live here, however, on lands that once belonged to the original inhabitants of this land. While we, the Jews, were not their oppressors – setting up mission schools where their lives were a misery and their culture nearly destroyed – surely we owe them our support and more than that, our outrage that conditions on many reserves are Third World.

According to this newspaper, some synagogues have banded together to call for action – but there should be many, many more.

Years ago I was associate director of the (now defunct) Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region. One task, among many, was to teach public high school students about the Holocaust through symposia and interaction with survivors. Another was to advocate for issues of social justice and combat racism.

We did not make common cause, however, with First Nations whose situation was dire indeed. Now is the time that those of us who survived because there was a place for us here should make common cause with First Nations asking, after all, for simple things: clean water, better maternal health, access to healthy affordable food, and freedom from preventable illnesses.

Flotillas, blockades and double standards

Norma Baumel Joseph

in Montreal

I just returned from a visit to Israel and I am bewildered. Israel is such a small country geographically. Its neighbours occupy such a vast expanse of land. Why do they covet this little country? Why fight over a laneway between mansions when there is so much acreage for each palace?

More significantly, we might understand when the neighbours can't see Israel's reality, but how is it that western human rights groups have such clouded vision? They fight for the rights of oppressed Palestinians, but only under very specific conditions. When Fatah and Hamas fight, we don't hear a word from the western world. When Assad kills Syrian rebels, these groups are silent. When Libya erupts, they are silent. Only when Israel is involved do we hear from these indignant human rights activists.

Most perplexing, they expect Israel to shake hands with a partner committed to its destruction. Israel is called upon to make all the necessary concessions without any responding moves from the Palestinians. There is no quid pro quo in this "justice" program. Reach out your hand to someone who will bite it off. That's their logic, but it certainly isn't logical.

We are told that their concern is for the children. Mine too. But theirs is one-sided: only for the Palestinian kids. They care not for Israeli children. I worry about Palestinian children who are taught to hate. I worry about Israeli children and the 45-second rule. Do you know it?

My nieces and nephews live in Yavneh. When they hear the siren, they run. No stopping to pick up a favourite toy or book. No hesitation. No time to call mommy or daddy. You go straight to the shelter – missiles are coming. You only have time to grab the dog and go, wherever you are. They understand, no matter how young.

This is a fact of life. It means that great-grandma, Bubby Miriam, my wonderful mother-in-law who is 95 can no longer visit her family. She can't pass the 45-second test. Neither can the elderly who live on kibbutz. What will happen to them when the Scuds really hit? Why don't the people in the flotillas care about them and their families?

Fundamentally, I also care about the parents of grown children who are missing in action. What about the parents of Gilad Schalit? Why do we never hear the human rights organizations ask questions about him and the abuses he has endured? Even the United Nations has admitted that the Palestinian kidnappers have violated every regulation and human rights rule. So where are their voices?

How come the great novelist Alice Walker can't hear the words of author Jonathan Safran Foer? How is it that she doesn't see the hatred and racism that appear so obvious to me? If the Hamas leadership would say to her what they are saying to Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, how would she respond?

Let's imagine the translation of the Hamas position: We will not stop until all Israeli Jews (African-Americans) are pushed into the sea. We will not allow Israeli Jews (African-Americans) to live in this country (Israel). How would she react to that? Underneath all the rhetoric, that's the claim of Hamas. They state it quite openly. Their goal is to destroy Israel and kill all the Jews in Israel. Do human rights groups not read anymore?

My husband suggested that we create our own symbolic flotilla in order to bring our human rights case to the UN and the world. What would it be if we set up a giant demonstration in front of the UN shouting from the rooftops our claims for decency, for our Israeli children, MIAs and justice? What a miracle it would be if every Jew withstood the urge to give to any UN charity and insisted that we will not give any money to them until Gilad Schalit speaks to his parents. Not one penny to any UN agency!

Let's start a chain e-mail now. Everyone write to everyone. No money to the UN. Let's get some justice for Gilad Schalit. Let's insist that human rights belong on a two-way street, and that they flow for Israel, too.

Palestinians gearing up for statehood bid

Barring a miraculous breakthrough in diplomacy, the Palestinians, represented by the Palestinian Authority and backed by the Arab League, are widely expected to take their case for statehood to the United Nations in the third week of September.

The Palestinians, who currently enjoy observer status at the UN, will seek full membership, PA President Mahmoud Abbas says. "Once admitted to the UN, our state stands ready to negotiate all core issues of the conflict with Israel," he wrote recently in the New York Times.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

In all probability, the PA will present its case for a two-state solution to the General Assembly rather than the Security Council. The Palestinians believe that while they have more than sufficient support at the General Assembly, their bid for statehood would be vetoed by the United States, Israel's chief ally, at the Security Council.

The PA envoy at the UN, Riyad Mansour, predicts that at least two thirds of the 192 UN member states will recognize a Palestinian state within the borders of the West Bank, part of which Israel claims, and the Gaza Strip, which is controlled by Hamas, an Islamic fundamentalist organization that rejects both Israel's existence and legitimacy.

The current Israeli government opposes the unilateral Palestinian campaign and has lobbied hard to nip it in the bud.

Israeli embassies have mobilized resources for what is shaping up as a diplomatic battle royale.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has travelled the world arguing against the Palestinian proposal while calling for a resumption of direct talks with the PA and warning that a declaration of statehood will "push peace back."

Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman, who usually voices Netanyahu's views, has threatened to renounce past agreements, including the Oslo accords, if the Palestinians go through with their gambit.

As PA leaders have repeatedly stated, they will only set aside their strategy if Israel agrees to talks broadly based on an Israeli withdrawal to the pre-1967 armistice lines.

"Negotiations remain our first option, but due to their failure we are now compelled to turn to the international community to assist us in preserving the opportunity for a peaceful and just end to the conflict," Abbas has written.

Talks, brokered by the United States, were launched exactly a year ago in Washington. More ceremonial than substantive, they soon collapsed in an atmosphere of mutual acrimony, the two sides driven apart by Israel's refusal to renew its partial nine-month settlement freeze in the West Bank and by the PA's demand that all building activity must cease, even in disputed eastern Jerusalem.

In short order, Netanyahu upped the ante.

He insisted on Palestinian recognition of Israel as a Jewish state. He declared that Israel intends to maintain a military presence along the Jordan River. He demanded that the PA cancel its reconciliation pact with Hamas (which has yet to be ratified).

Although the Obama administration once supported the PA position on a settlement freeze, the United States has invested considerable efforts to stave off plans by the PA to go the UN.

Washington believes that Palestinian statehood should be the outcome of negotiations with Israel in bilateral talks. But the PA is convinced that peace has run its course, a claim that conforms with an assessment made recently by the UN's special co-ordinator for peace in the Middle East, Robert Serry.

In a gloomy appraisal, Serry said that Israel's conflict with the Palestinians is in a "profound and persistent deadlock." He added, "In the absence of a framework for meaningful talks, and with Israeli settlement activity continuing, the Palestinians are actively exploring approaching the UN."

Of late, Israel has issued a series of announcements of its intention to build more than 2,000 apartment units in the eastern Jerusalem neighborhoods of Har Homa and Ramat Shlomo and in Ariel, one of the largest Israeli settlements in the West Bank. Israel's justification for these moves turns on its oft-repeated assertion that parts of the West Bank and eastern Jerusalem will remain in Israeli hands, even after a peace agreement. Israel claims that there is a national consensus for keeping these areas.

The PA has condemned these unilateral acts, describing them as "an Israeli attempt to obstruct and destroy what is left of any effort to revive the peace process." The Mideast Quartet – the United States, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations – has expressed great concern that this construction activity will derail all hope for resuming negotiations.

Shimon Peres, Israel's president, has met with Abbas four times in the past few months to revive talks and head off a unilateral Palestinian declaration of statehood. But he has made no progress.

In a tactical bid to outflank the Palestinians and relieve international pressure on Israel, Netanyahu sent a letter to the Quartet last month in which he reportedly accepted a two-state solution based on the 1967 lines and territorial swaps.

The Palestinian Authority is taking its case for statehood to the United Nations, a position supported by most Palestinians, including these from eastern Jerusalem. [Sheldon Kirshner photo]

When U.S. President Barack Obama suggested in May that talks should proceed on this basis, Netanyahu demurred, claiming that the pre-Six Day War borders are "indefensible."

Netanyahu's apparent shift in policy could be significant if he means what he says. The PA, cognizant that Netanyahu's coalition partners are opposed to the pre-1967 lines as a starting point for discussions, is wary.

According to reports, PA leaders want Netanyahu to spell out his apparently new policy in public. Netanyahu, eager to preserve his coalition, is unlikely to satisfy them. At last report, he had resigned himself to the Palestinian campaign for international recognition at the UN.

Israel's strategy is to persuade key nations, such as the United States, Canada, Britain, Germany and France, to vote against the Palestinians.

But by all accounts, Russia, China, Turkey, Norway and a plethora of South American countries, led by Brazil and Argentina, will side with the Palestinians.

France, at the moment, is one of the wild cards. French Foreign Minister Francois Fillon has said that 2011 should be the year that an independent Palestinian state is created.

Jews in Israel are divided on the issue, judging by a letter signed by a group of prominent Israeli intellectuals and public figures almost four months ago. Among the signers were Alon Liel, the former director of the foreign ministry, and Avishai Margalit, an Israel Prize winner.

They endorse the establishment of a sovereign Palestinian state based on the 1967 lines and land exchanges on a one-to-one basis. As they put it, "The Palestinian appeal to the UN [for recognition] does not harm the Israeli interest and is not at odds with the peace process."

To many Israelis, the Palestinian campaign for statehood is remarkably similar to the one the Zionist movement launched before the UN General Assembly voted for the partition of Palestine in 1947.

The parallels are indeed striking.

New fund aids march participants

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Each year, the March of the Living takes hundreds of Jewish young people on a life-changing journey to Poland and Israel. Accompanied by Holocaust survivors, the participants learn about their heritage and explore the most significant events in modern Jewish history.

While thousands of students and young adults have taken part in the program since 1988, there aren't enough funds to subsidize those who can't afford to attend.

But it's more critical than ever that as many young Jews as possible get the opportunity to go on the march, because their generation will be the last to share the experience with Holocaust survivors, whose stories must be heard, said Eli Rubenstein, national director of March of the Living Canada.

Anita Ekstein, a Holocaust survivor and national chair of March of the Living Canada, recently decided to address the issue by creating an endowment fund under the auspices of the Jewish Foundation at UJA Toronto and UIA Federations Canada.

The fund will help ensure scholarship money for students who are unable to pay the full cost of the program, as well as higher educational standards and increased recruitment resources that will encourage higher student participation over the next decade.

"My connection to the March of the Living is a long one. I began in 1996 to go on the March as a survivor chaperone, and this year was my 11th time," Ekstein said.

At only eight years old, Ekstein was smuggled out of the ghetto by her father to live as a Christian with a Polish family. Her father's last words to her were: "Always remember who you are," she recalled. "And in truth I never forgot who I was. I was a Jew."

As a survivor, she said, "it is very important for me that students and young adults have the opportunity to go back to Poland, learn about the culture that was and how it was lost. And of course learn first-hand what happened during the Holocaust by visiting several concentration and death camps. Then go to Israel, visit our country, learn more about it and strengthen their connection to Israel."

Ekstein has already given $100,000 to the endowment fund, with more pledged for the future. Other substantial donations have also been received, including a gift of $500,000 from the Ben and Hilda Katz Foundation.

During their lifetime, Ben and Hilda Katz were longstanding supporters of Holocaust education for Jewish youth, Rubenstein said. Through the establishment of the fund and such generous gifts, he said, more Jewish students will be able to act as "witnesses for the witnesses."

At "An Evening of Inspiration," an event held Aug. 17 at the home of Malka and Harry Rosenbaum, students, young adults and survivors who have taken part in the march gathered with friends and family members to share testimonials and raise awareness of the endowment fund.

Organized by past march participants Lisa Winberg, Jessica Taylor and Shael Rosenbaum, the evening was a reminder of how powerful the experience is. "The kids come back with the impact of universal and Jewish values," including a greater sense of Jewish identity, faith and practice, a greater sense of community, and a greater need to confront antisemitism and counter Holocaust denial, Rubenstein said.

Winberg, who took part in the 2011 Young Adult March, said she was "extremely motivated" to share her experiences. As she continued to tell people about the program, she realized she "needed to do something to help ensure that more people would be able to have the same opportunity."

Winberg said she's a firm believer in experiential education. "Survivors share their stories with the participants and the participants will then share these stories with others. I think that without the March of the Living, many of these stories would be lost, and it is so important that we continue to send students and young adults every year to ensure that these stories are never forgotten."

Winberg hopes that the endowment fund "will be a huge success and allow more people to experience the march. Cost has definitely been the largest obstacle for young adults to participate in March of the Living, and I really believe that if the cost was lower, many more people would be able to take this incredible journey."

Unfortunately, we couldn't fit everyone in the picture.

Jewish school heads downtown

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

The Morris Winchevsky School is returning to its roots with a move to downtown Toronto this month.

The Sunday morning school, which serves the secular Jewish community, opened downtown 83 years ago for children of Yiddish-speaking eastern European Jewish immigrants. It relocated to the Lawrence Avenue and Bathurst Street area in 1960, and is among several organizations, including the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir and United Jewish People's Order, housed in the Winchevsky Centre on Cranbrooke Avenue.

Denise Handlarski

School offices will remain at the centre, but as of Sept. 18, programming will be held in rented space at the 918 Bathurst Centre in the Annex area. A pilot program was held there in the spring.

The move is part of a series of changes at the school, education director Denise Handlarski told The CJN.

A longtime teacher at the school with a B.Ed. from Queen's University, the 31-year-old rabbinic candidate in the Humanistic Jewish movement assumed her new administrative role in April. She will continue to teach bar and bat mitzvah students at the school.

The school's move downtown comes in response to decreased enrolment in recent years and to feedback from parents, many of whom live downtown, who said they liked the program but not the "shlep," according to Handlarski.

The school also serves families as far away as Thornhill, Richmond Hill, Ajax and Brampton, she added.

In the late 1990s, the school had about 70 students, but that number had dwindled down to about 10 a year ago, Handlarski said. Enrolment doubled when the pilot program began at 918 Bathurst last spring.

She attributed the "dramatic shift" to the move, because the program itself didn't change "in any significant way," although some new "modules" have been added.

The six-week modules form the basic curriculum and provide flexibility for students. Each module highlights a theme and also incorporates a core program that covers Jewish holidays, life-cycle events and history.

Among the themes are Jewish cooking, Jewish pirates of the Caribbean, Jewish comics and cartoons, tikkun olam and tzedakah, genealogy, Jews of the ancient world, Jewish music, and eco-Jews.

The school, which has classes for preschoolers through bar and bat mitzvah, had no previous affiliation with 918 Bathurst, which serves as a local community centre.

Ont. boosts funding for hate crimes unit

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The government of Ontario last week announced $400,000 in new money to support the provincial Joint Forces Hate Crime and Extremism Investigative Team (HCEIT), a network of 13 Ontario police forces' intelligence units.

"This funding allows police services to continue to build the database of thousands of intelligence reports on hate crime and extremist groups in the province and allow them access to this information as they investigate hate crimes," said Jim Bradley, minister of community safety and correctional services.

Jim Bradley

"Our government is committed to helping police services counter hate crime wherever it occurs in Ontario. We are giving police the tools they need to do their job. That includes investigating and prosecuting those who would promote hate and criminal extremism in our community," Bradley stated.

The minister announced the new funding, which will be paid out over two years, at the Benjamin Vaughan District Park in Thornhill, near the location of an antisemitic incident that took place in 2004. At that time, a number of homes were spray-painted with swastikas and antisemitic slogans.

More recently, Bradley noted, the Beth Tikvah synagogue, on Bayview Avenue between Sheppard and Finch avenues, was defaced with antisemitic graffiti.

Although no arrests have been made in the Thornhill incident, police have been co-operating with local communities to develop "a proactive approach to preventing the incidence of hate crimes, Bradley said.

"By monitoring extremist groups and sharing information with police services, the team is able to anticipate problems and deal with them more effectively," he added.

Bradley said the Ontario government is inviting community groups to submit proposals to create local strategies to address hate crimes. The province has allocated $855,000 under the Safer and Vital Communities grant program for the initiative, with a maximum outlay of $50,000 for each successful proposal.

Len Rudner, director of community relations and outreach for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), applauded the new HCEIT funding. "We consider it important funding for this effort. It's a great investigative tool, a great educational tool."

Bernie Farber, a former CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, noted that York Regional Police now have 21 officers involved in their hate crime and diversity unit, up from two only a few years ago. "That speaks volumes" about the importance police now attach to the effort to stymie hate crimes, he said.

The funding announcement was made in the same provincial riding – Thornhill – that Farber is contesting on behalf of the Liberal Party. He is seeking to unseat incumbent Conservative MPP Peter Shurman in the Oct. 6 provincial election.

The Ontario government last week increased funding to fight hate crimes.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kósher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Using summer to focus our spirit

Rabbi Eliezer Breitowitz

Rabbis often lament the odd way in which the Jewish and secular calendars relate to one another. The tempo of the lazy days of summer has little in common with the three weeks of intense mourning that commemorate the destruction of the Holy Temple in Jerusalem, yet they are observed simultaneously. The mindless fun of summer hardly seems to be a fitting lead-in to the introspective High Holidays, yet, again, the dual calendars play this odd trick, dragging us from cottage and beach to repentance and awe.

However, there may be more here than meets the eye. Summer vacation may be the best possible lead-in to the High Holidays, if we only would reflect on the changed nature of our lives and the world in the last half-century.

The classical ethical works of Judaism identify fundamental personality flaws that lead to moral lapses. These include pride, anger, lust, jealousy and lethargy, which we must still grapple with. But in addition to these conventional causes of sin, modern man is afflicted by new challenges.

The stresses we face today are unprecedented. We start the day with longer and longer commutes. We work in offices and businesses that demand more and more productivity and provide less and less satisfaction and security. Our social relationships are in tatters and fail to provide the emotional support we need. Technology has stolen from us the few available avenues of escape – we are always connected to our pressurized worlds through e-mail, faxes, smart phones and laptops. Even our recreation has become more bound to cyberspace breaking down the conventional barriers between work and play.

Rabbinic Reflections

These stresses have created a mental state that is called – in rabbinic Hebrew – pizur hanefesh, a scattering of the soul, in contrast to the ideal state of harmony and balance, menuchas hanefesh, tranquility of the soul. It is no wonder that, in this fractured state of mind, we have little motivation to invest the time and effort needed to cultivate our spiritual sides and precious relationships. As well, we have lost the clarity and focus that would enable us to make the good decisions that we would be proud of some day as we look back.

An optimal summer vacation would give us an opportunity to clear our minds and rejuvenate our souls. Some people's idea of "vacation fun" – frenetic sightseeing and amusement parks – may leave their nerves more ragged than before. I believe such vacations would be lost opportunities. Rest, fresh air, wholesome food, enjoyment of nature and meaningful time spent with loved ones instead would provide the healing and tranquility our souls are often denied.

Such a summer vacation would be the perfect prelude to the High Holidays. With spirits that are rested, tranquil and focused, we would be better equipped to direct our attention to introspection and setting meaningful goals for ourselves, which, after all is said, is the essence of what Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur are all about.

Sadly, by the time you read these words, July and August will have passed. Hopefully the last few days of summer will achieve their potential and be a source of blessing for the seasons ahead.

Rabbi Eliezer Breitowitz is dean of Yeshiva Darchei Torah in Toronto.

Israeli income disparity must shrink

One must be "thankful" when the news coming out of Israel is the high price of cottage cheese. As is so often the case, it's a relatively minor event that sparks major repercussions, often with unintended consequences. This is true not only in national or international relations, but in our personal lives as well. Modern technology enables issues that may have taken decades to surface in the past to do so in weeks, days or even hours. Yet despite the power of modern technology, not every problem can be solved as quickly as it surfaces.

Major transformations bring much dislocation in their wake. The advent of the car hurt the horse and buggy business. E-books have forced book publishers to shift focus, and major chains have hurt mom and pop stores. While some get (super) rich, many may lose their jobs, not because of a recession, but because of rapid economic growth.

Nowhere has the economic upheaval been greater than in Israel. A barren sparsely populated desert has been transformed into an economic powerhouse in a short 60 years. The list of Israeli technological innovations is breathtaking. Many are described in the best-selling book Start-Up Nation: The Story of Israel's Economic Miracle. Once thought of as a place to send our charitable dollars, Israel has become one of the best places to invest for those looking to turn a profit.

Lest one think that a profit motive is somehow less noble than helping the idealistic but poor pioneers living in a socialist backwater, our sages assert that the highest form of tzedakah is not the giving of charity but rather investments that create jobs and help the needy become self-sufficient. One can and should have their cake and eat it too.

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

Yet despite, or perhaps because of, the rapid economic growth, while Israel as a whole can be counted among the wealthiest nations of the world, many of its citizens are not. The gap between rich and poor is widening everywhere, but nowhere is this problem greater than in Israel. No other country in the western world has a greater income disparity between rich and poor. While the causes for this are many, including huge segments of the population who actually choose not to seek employment, it's a problem that threatens the social fabric of the country.

The resonance of the "tent cities" in so many segments of Israeli society – rich and poor, religious and secular, Ashkenazi and Sephardi, settler and leftist – speaks to the depth of the problem, but also gives hope for a solution. When so many are united in a proper cause, solutions are much easier to come by.

It seems to me that some variation of Warren Buffet's plea to tax the super wealthy at higher rates is an equitable must. While Israelis are deeply divided on so many core issues, the values of tzedakah, chesed, and tikkun olam are deeply embedded in the Jewish psyche.

Tragically the terrorist attacks near Eilat turned our focus elsewhere. Let us pray that the year 5772 ushers in a period where Israeli energies will be able to focus on the social needs of the country.

Rosh Hashanah machzor opens new front in siddur wars

Just in time for Rosh Hashanah 5772, Koren press has published a fine new Orthodox machzor (holiday prayer book). The Koren Rosh Hashana Mahzor features an introduction, translation and commentary (all in English) by Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, chief rabbi of the United Kingdom.

The publication of this machzor represents round two in the prayerbook wars between the haredi (fervently Orthodox) and modern Orthodox camps. Until recently, the haredi Artscroll Publications had a virtual monopoly on the market for bilingual prayerbooks in North American Orthodox synagogues – both haredi and modern. Then, two years ago, the modern Orthodox Koren-Sacks made a foray into the non-High Holiday prayerbook market. In a column in these pages ("Get ready for duelling prayerbooks," May 7, 2009), I described the major differences in approach between Artscroll and Koren-Sacks. Those differences apply to the machzorim as well.

Views & Reviews

Martin Lockshin

For instance, one of the most moving prayers of the machzor is Unetanneh Tokef, which describes how on Rosh Hashanah it is decided who will live and who will die. Yet we can avert harsh decrees through repentance, prayer, and charity. According to Artscroll's introduction to Unetanneh Tokef, this prayer was "written by Rabbi Amnon of Mainz, Germany, about 1,000 years ago." Artscroll retells in excruciating detail the story of Rabbi Amnon's refusal to convert to Christianity and how he was dismembered as punishment by the Bishop of Mainz, ultimately leading to his death, but not before composing and reciting this prayer for the first time on Rosh Hashanah in the synagogue in Mainz.

Artscroll then relates that three days after his death, "Rabbi Amnon appeared in a dream to Rabbi Klonimos ben Meshulam… and taught him the text of Unesaneh Tokef, and asked him to send it to all parts of Jewry to be inserted into their liturgy. Rabbi Amnon's wish was carried out."

The Koren-Sacks machzor retells this same story with far fewer details (it leaves out the dismemberment and the dream) and then adds, "The discovery of ancient manuscripts in the Cairo Genizah suggests, however that the prayer may be older than this… composed in Israel several centuries before."

Instead of the agonizing details of the legend of Rabbi Amnon's death, Rabbi Sacks substitutes a moving and helpful introduction to the contents of the prayer. (Artscroll does not have an overview of the contents of the prayer.)

Rabbi Sacks begins by providing a literary overview of the prayer: "The language is simple, the imagery strong, the rhythm insistent and the drama intense." Then he shows us how the prayer consists of four movements. The first sets the scene in the heavenly court. The second "defines what is at stake: Who will live and who will die." The third section "provides the great outburst that defines Judaism as a religion of hope. No fate is final. Repentance, prayer and charity can avert the evil decree. Life is not a script written by Aeschylus or Sophocles in which tragedy is inexorable. God forgives." Then the final section of the prayer provides "a moving reflection on the fragility of human life and the eternity of God. We are no more than a fragment of pottery, a blade of grass, a flower that… But God is life forever."

This tension between the idea that we humans have great powers to change ourselves and the world through repentance and good deeds, and the feeling that we are nothing more than the equivalent of a shard of pottery or a fading flower is one of the central tensions of Jewish prayer. Rabbi Sacks's commentary helps us negotiate that tension.

In his introduction to the machzor, Rabbi Sacks highlights this human power when he writes that Judaism is demanding, because it "is the religion of the free human being freely responding to the God of freedom. We are not in the grip of sin. We are not determined by economic forces or psychological drives or genetically encoded impulses that we are powerless to resist… We are not mere accidents of matter… We are here because a loving God brought… us into existence." And yet he points out that on Rosh Hashanah comes the sound of the shofar, "piercing our defences, a wordless cry in a religion of words, a sound produced by breath as if to teach us that that is all that life is – a mere breath – yet breath is nothing less than the spirit of God within us."

Another contrast in the prayers of the machzor is between our small stature and God's majesty and kingship. The idea of "God as king" often does not speak to us moderns, since, fortunately, we are no longer subject to the rule of kings who have life-and-death power over us.

But Rabbi Sacks makes the concept of God's kingship relevant. "The idea of Divine Kingship has been historically one of Judaism's greatest contributions to western civilization, though its implications were not fully understood until the 15th and 16th centuries when, under the influence of the Christian Hebraists, the foundations of modern democracy were laid in Europe and America. The idea of God as the supreme King entails that no human ruler or government has absolute authority. Every nation is under God, meaning that God's command establishes the moral limits of power. Lacking this idea, the first and greatest democracy of ancient times, the Athens of Solon, descended into tyranny… Without the constraint of the idea that above all human kings is the Divine King, all power tends to corrupt, and absolute power corrupts absolutely."

Rabbi Sacks also points out the genius of the prayer Avinu Malkeinu, where we repeatedly refer to God as both our Father and our King. Then we "with utter simplicity pray that God sees us with the love of a parent before considering our lives with the detachment of a king."

This coming Rosh Hashanah, I intend to pray from the Koren machzor and hope to draw inspiration from Rabbi Sacks's intellectually stimulating and spiritually uplifting commentary. And I look forward to next fall, when the companion Yom Kippur volume is scheduled to be published.

Israeli teens connect with Canadian peers

Laura Fixman
Intern

For nearly 30 years, the Israeli Victims of War Association (IVOW) has provided trips to Canada for 12- and 13-year-old kids whose parents or siblings have been seriously injured or killed while serving in the Israel Defence Forces.

Moishe Borek of Montreal organizes and finances the operation with the help of many volunteers. He said the trips are once-in-a-lifetime opportunities for the kids, and he considers them bar and bat mitzvah gifts for the youngsters.

The group spends three weeks at a variety of overnight camps, as well as touring Toronto and Montreal.

Borek said he hears stories from kids who are still friends with the people they met on the program 20 years ago.

"All of them suffered a trauma in their lives, and they retain the friends they make for the rest of their life," he said. "This program gives them a chance to see the world and see that there are people who do care."

On Aug. 25, the kids had their final breakfast at United Bakers Dairy Restaurant, where IVOW has been taking kids for 20 years. United Bakers also provides them with packed lunches, and Borek said United Bakers workers are among the many volunteers who help make the trip memorable.

"We all share in the same good deed to shine a light in someone's life," he said.

Borek added that IVOW has brought more than 2,500 kids to Canada over the years. It gets the names of eligible kids from the IDF, and volunteers interview them throughout the year in Israel. The kids come from all over Israel, and the only cost to their families is the plane ticket.

Israeli youth on the Israeli Victims of War Association trip to Toronto enjoyed a final breakfast in Toronto before their return home last week. [Laura Fixman photo]

The organization is funded by people who want to do what they can for children who have suffered a trauma, Borek said. He said many participants eventually return as counsellors.

One of the current counsellors, Shahaf (who didn't want to disclose her last name), liked the trip so much when she went 10 years ago that she always knew she wanted to return as a counsellor after she was finished her army service.

"I had a really good time as a kid… so I wanted to come back," she said. "I have more responsibility now, but it's still fun, and everything about the camps is still my favourite part."

Borek said IVOW wanted to send the children to summer camps as part of the trip so they could experience an environment different from the one in Israel.

"They have a few camps in Israel, but all the camps here have a lake, so they have nothing like this," he said. "These kids didn't know each other before, and after this experience, they're friends and they have something in common."

He said that as soon as each session ends, the program gets many requests from the various branches of the IDF to consider children for the program.

Borek said programs like IVOW change perceptions of the IDF and its soldiers. "No one considers that these people have a heart and have a family," he said.

One of his favourite stories that illustrates the success of the program is about a man who was injured in the first Lebanon war and eventually lost his eyesight. What he found most difficult was that he could no longer participate in many activities with his son. He told Borek that his son was able to experience things in Canada that he couldn't do with his father in Israel.

Borek emphasized that he can't take all the credit for the program and that he's only doing what anyone else would do if they could. "It's just a way to help people who need it," he said. "We're not heroes."

Israel shoemaker thanks merchant

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — An Israeli shoe manufacturer visited St. Denis Street recently to personally thank the store that has continued to carry his products despite almost a year of picketing by boycotters.

Ami Bar Nahor, founder and president of BeautiFeel, dropped by Boutique Le Marcheur Aug. 16 to see for himself that his shoes are still prominently on display under the company slogan – in Hebrew – "Every woman deserves at least one pair."

The burly, shaggy-haired Bar Nahor, wearing a T-shirt proclaiming "Oui à la Boutique Le Marcheur," met with assistant manager Kevin Brodeur, a relative of owner Yves Archambault, who was out of town on vacation.

Bar Nahor also went across the street to greet staff at Chaussures Naot, which mainly sells Israeli footwear and has become the focus of the Saturday demonstrations by the group Palestinian and Jewish Unity (PAJU) in recent months.

Its owners are based in Toronto.

Bar Nahor thanked as well some of the pro-Israel activists who regularly come to St. Denis to counter the boycotters. Among them are members of Amitiés Québec-Israel, a group of largely non-Jewish francophones.

He was accompanied to the stores by Jack Kincler, one of the leading counter-boycott activists and a past representative of the Israel-Canada Chamber of Commerce.

Kincler, who has known Bar Nahor since 2008, has been keeping him informed about the targeting of Le Marcheur that started last October because it stocks BeautiFeel shoes, a small part of its inventory.

Ben Nahor said that to the best of his his knowledge, Le Marcheur is the only outlet in the world selling his shoes that has been focus of the international boycott campaign against Israel.

BeautiFeel, founded in 1989, now sells its products in more than a 1,000 outlets in 17 countries, including throughout the United States, Canada, Europe, Australia and Russia. In some cities, such as Los Angeles, it has its own stores.

Bar Nahor has been doing business in Canada for almost 15 years, and BeautiFeel shoes can be found in several Montreal-area stores and around the province.

"I really admire that he has stood up to them," Bar Nahor said of Archambault. "It's as if somebody hijacks you and asks for a ransom. In my opinion, it is a form of terror. They have the right to demonstrate, but not to use that right against democracy itself.

Hillel raises tents on NA campuses

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Hillel of Greater Toronto is considering joining a group of other Hillel centres across North America in setting up tents to serve as spaces for respectful dialogue about Israel and Middle East issues.

About 20 North American campuses will erect "Talk Israel" tents as a proactive measure to respond to the anticipated "increased agitation and confusion" on campuses that may follow the expected United Nations vote on Palestinian statehood this month.

The initiative, introduced last month at Hillel's annual conference, held this year at Washington University in St. Louis, is meant to present Hillel, according to its literature, as the "central address for students seeking a discussion of Israel and the shifting Mideast landscape that is both supportive and welcoming."

Hillel of Greater Toronto's director of Israel programming Shirin Ezekiel said Hillel Toronto and Hillel Montreal were approached by Hillel International to be part of the initiative.

But Ezekiel was unable to confirm whether Toronto universities will take part in the program.

"It really fully depends on our student leadership feeling comfortable and wanting to lead this initiative. They are not back to campus yet. They just had their first leadership meeting."

The idea is that the Talk Israel Tents will go up for a full day later this month, to present students with a "hub of conversation and context."

Hillel staff will organize dialogue groups and promote speakers who support Israel and a viable two-state solution. They may also set up a video link to allow for speakers who aren't able to make it to campus to present their views.

Ultimately, each campus will decide what will take place in the tents, as long rules of civil discourse are upheld.

Ezekiel said she hopes the initiative will help ease any tensions that may arise between pro-Palestinian and pro-Israel students.

"Any initiative that helps to create an atmosphere of civil discourse furthers understanding of Israel as a Jewish state, promotes the importance of face-to-face negotiations and sets a foundation for discussion of mutual Israeli-Palestinian needs would be a help to the campus climate."

Not only was Hillel Toronto chosen as one of the 20 campuses to participate in this initiative, it was also named by Hillel International as one of four Israel centres of excellence along with the University of Miami, UC Irvine, and Emory University in the United States.

"Toronto was chosen, I think, because we have different types of campuses with different initiatives, and we offer a variety of campaigns and cultural opportunities," Ezekiel said.

"Last year all of our Israel-related events such as Layla Lavan [an event modeled after Nuit Blanch] were sold out and exceeded expectations."

Ezekiel added that Hillel International recognized the passion and drive of the student leaders in Toronto and decided that other Hillel centres could benefit form their example.

"Together we can redefine how advocacy and engagement is done on campuses in North America."

Student guilty of anti-Israel racism

A university student in Scotland was found guilty of racism after insulting a fellow student's Israeli flag, and he was expelled from St. Andrews University. The student reportedly told an exchange student from Yeshiva University that Israel is a terrorist state and the flag is a terrorist symbol. He then put his hands down his pants and then rubbed them on the small flag hanging on the wall, the BBC reported.

JNF Winnipeg gets new exec dir

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Jewish National Fund has announced that Rob Berkowits, a lifelong Winnipegger with a strong background in organizational management, will be its new executive director for this community

The JNF has decided to take a different approach to running its offices on the Prairies. Rather than replacing Erez Rotem, whose contract wasn't renewed, with a new shaliach for the three Prairie provinces, the organization plans to hire executive directors for its Winnipeg office (covering Manitoba and Saskatchewan) and for Alberta. (Future shaliachs will only be involved in fundraising.)

"I am grateful to the JNF for this opportunity," Berkowits said. "Karen and Mel Lazareck [immediate JNF past president for this region], Sharon Glass [who was on the search committee] and Joe Rabinovitch [JNF Canada's executive vice-president] have been very welcoming. I have always had an interest in Israel. I believe I have the skill sets that this position requires."

Berkowits said he has received a number of phone calls and e-mails from community members congratulating him on his new role.

Originally from the North End, Berkowits attended public schools growing up. He received his Jewish education at the Rosh Pina Synagogue evening school program.

For a number of years he volunteered at the Israel Pavillion at Folklorama and played baseball in the local B'nai Brith adult league. Berkowits began building his resume in community organization management early on. In 1989, at age 18, he managed the 2,300-seat Rainbow Stage, a popular summer-only theatre that puts on musicals in north Winnipeg's Kildonan Park. He began volunteering there several years earlier. He remained active at Rainbow Stage – as a volunteer and, for some years, a member of the board of directors – for 25 years.

The next stage in his professional development came when he became affiliated with community leader and businessman Earl Barish, a longtime basketball fan who brought pro basketball to Winnipeg for a few years in the 1990s. Berkowits managed Barish's team, the Winnipeg Cyclones, which played in the now-defunct International Basketball Association.

Berkowits also worked with Barish organizing teams of local Jewish athletes competing in the Maccabiah Games in Israel.

"I learned a lot of about business from Earl," Berkowits said. "He was an excellent mentor."

In 2000, Berkowits was hired as executive director of Football Manitoba, an umbrella organization that deals with all aspects of organized football in the province, from recruiting and retaining coaches and officials to delivering programs and events.

His last day at Football Manitoba is Sept. 9. That weekend, he will be attending his first JNF national conference in Montreal.

As JNF executive director, Berkowits said, his first priority will be getting to know his staff, board and the corporate philosophy. "I want to retain our mainstay programs [the Tu b'Shvat telethon and the Negev Gala] and add new and innovative programs," he said. "Our regular supporters are aging. We need to attract younger people."

Layton lauded as '21st century Tommy Douglas'

MONTREAL — One of Jeff Itcush's enduring memories of Jack Layton is of him running up the winding staircases of Mile End whistling the show tune Seventy-six Trombones.

Itcush campaigned door-to-door with the New Democratic Party leader during the 2007 byelection on behalf of Thomas Mulcair, now co-deputy leader of the party.

Jack Layton

Itcush, however, was not a Layton supporter from the outset. In fact, he worked for the campaign of Bill Blaikie of Manitoba, Layton's chief rival for the party leadership in 2003.

The Torontonian Layton was somewhat further left in his views than Itcush, who was born and raised in Regina, Sask., and was drawn to the more moderate politics of a fellow Prairie native.

"After the leadership convention, Jack worked very hard to unify the party," said Itcush, a Bialik High School teacher who ran for the NDP in Mount Royal in the May 2 election and has been active in the party since he was in high school. He has served on both its federal and provincial executives.

In 2003, the party was more divided than the public might have perceived, and Layton succeeded in getting the various factions to "bury the hatchet," Itcush said.

"He gradually gained my trust... I was skeptical on some issues, related to the environment and the economy, but through his gentle powers of persuasion, he was able to make me see things differently."

The new leader will need Layton's ability to contain fractiousness without being domineering, he thinks.

Speaking after the leader's death, Itcush paid the ultimate NDPer's compliment to Layton: that he had become the "21st-century Tommy Douglas," in terms of vision and ideals.

During the 2007 Outremont byelection, which resulted in the NDP electing only its second ever member from Quebec, Itcush said came to know Layton better on a personal level.

Like many people, he was captivated by his "boundless energy, boundless cheerfulness."

"He had an affinity with cyclists and when [bare-headed] well-wishers greeted him, Jack would gently remind them of the importance of wearing a helmet. He would say, 'It's lot easier to fix your elbow than your head.'"

Layton's decency was genuine, Itcush said. "I never heard him say anything negative about anybody. He believed there was good in every person, if you gave them the opportunity to let that goodness emerge. And he never bore a grudge. He was always moving on, looking to the future."

Layton attended Itcush's nomination meeting in August 2010, probably the first time an NDP leader made an official appearance in Mount Royal, which has been a Liberal stronghold since before World War II and whose NDP standard-bearers have traditionally been little more than names on a ballot.

Layton offered a portrait of Itcush that went beyond what could be found on his c.v., describing how Itcush inspired his students to get involved in political and international issues.

"I learned that he had taken the trouble to ask some of my former students about me," Itcush said.

As a strong supporter of Israel, Itcush said he was heartened by Layton's approach to the Middle East.

"He was very prudent. He knew any statements he made had to be well-researched, and he had a network of people from whom he received counsel. He was very determined to make sure the party had a balanced perspective on the Middle East. I know that can be defined differently, but the era before him was trying, to say the least," for someone pro-Israel like himself, Itcush added.

Layton was warmly received in May 2010 when he attended the second annual party of the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee held in Montreal, an opportunity for young adults to mingle with elected officials.

Itcush concedes it will be hard to find someone to succeed Layton. "But I really sense optimism because of the many young people who gathered after his death and the discussions we've had."

Whether the NDP will be able to maintain its newfound popularity in Quebec is a question Itcush hesitates to answer.

"We never anticipated the breakthrough in Quebec. At the beginning of the campaign, we thought we might get two or three more seats, and increase support by about 10 per cent in several ridings," he said.

Mount Royal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler said he formed a personal bond with Layton, overcoming partisanship, after learning both of their fathers had suffered from prostate cancer.

"Canada has lost a great parliamentarian, public servant and advocate for social justice," Cotler said in a statement. "He was a person of uncommon courage and determination...

"Jack was a consummate parliamentarian. People may not realize how often he would define the narrative of the day in the House of Commons and then take it to the public square.

"He had a unique talent to articulate the anxieties and hopes of ordinary Canadians, who came to know and love him as 'Jack.' It was a privilege to serve in the House with him and to witness his indomitable spirit. We shall not see the likes of him again."

Just hours after Layton's death, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) announced that it's setting up a scholarship fund in his honour.

CIJA chair David Koschitzky said in a statement that his organization would soon establish the Jack Layton Scholarship for Social Justice "to be awarded annually to a Canadian student who demonstrates a meaningful commitment to enhancing Canada's quality of life."

Koschitzky called Layton a "lifelong fighter for many causes dear to Canada's Jewish community."

A CIJA spokesperson told The CJN the scholarship would be funded through donations and that a "small committee" will be put in place to set the award criteria and choose the recipient. "We expect the first award to be made in the spring of 2012."

The size of the scholarship is yet to be determined.

Balanced coverage, but where's the outrage?

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Just before the news broke early last week that Libyan rebel forces had advanced through Moammar Gadhafi's crumbling lines and had made their way to Tripoli, all but putting a sudden end to the dictator's rule, the Canadian media gave substantial attention to the Gaza-based rocket fire striking southern Israel. That coverage, however, was quickly eclipsed by the dramatic and unexpected developments in the Libyan capital.

Still, it should not be overlooked that, with few exceptions, the media reported in a clear and straightforward manner about the aggression coming from Gaza. Typical was the ctv.ca report on Aug. 21, which began: "Militants in the Hamas-ruled Gaza Strip bombarded southern Israel with rockets and mortars Sunday, striking an empty school and sending thousands of Israelis into bomb shelters, as Israel responded with air strikes and diplomats scrambled to keep a new convulsion of Israeli-Palestinian violence from escalating."

"The latest round of hostilities was triggered [Aug. 18] by militants who launched an attack from Egyptian territory, ambushing Israeli cars and buses along the border and killing eight people. Israel says an armed Palestinian faction from Gaza was responsible."

Some Postmedia papers such as the Vancouver Sun carried an AFP story that day that provided statistics about the extent of the attacks: "Violence in and around Gaza entered its fourth day, with 22 rockets hitting southern Israel a day after a Grad rocket killed an Israeli man and injured 18 in the southern desert city of Be'er Sheva, which is home to 194,000 people."

According to Israeli authorities, it was the Popular Resistance Committees (PRC) that crossed from Egypt's southern Sinai into Israel across the porous border near Eilat. The attacks by PRC terror operatives carried out on Aug. 18 killed eight Israelis and wounded scores more. Israel's targeted air strike on southern Gaza in response resulted in the death of the PRC leader and two of his deputies.

The rocket fire into Israel has continued – more than 100 missiles in the past week – despite Egypt's efforts to get Hamas and other factions to agree to a ceasefire, which they have rejected. There is no dearth in the supply of these missiles, mostly from Iran. But there are also other sources. In the Aug. 23 Winnipeg Free Press, Samuel Segev described how groups such as Al Qaeda, working with Bedouin tribes in the lawless Sinai, have smuggled scores of rockets from Libya into Gaza, although some have reportedly also been stored in the Sinai itself.

In the meantime, many Israelis are asking, "Where are the international condemnations of these terrorist attacks?" Where is the outrage over the ongoing rocket fire from Gaza aimed at Israeli civilians – a war crime that has continued for years and that, for many foreign observers, has seemingly acquired the status of relatively innocuous normalcy? No other country could be expected to put up with one missile fired onto its territory, let alone thousands.

Speaking of a gaping silence, in his Aug. 20 National Post column, Robert Fulford raised incisive, stinging questions about the left's silence over Syrian President Bashar Assad's slaughter of citizens who dare to challenge his brutal police-state rule.

While a small group of Syrians protested, reportedly alone, at the Syrian embassy in Ottawa earlier this month, where, Fulford asked, "where were all the Canadian-born experts on the Middle East, those vociferous and self-righteous moralists, who come out of the woodwork every time Israel appears to be in violation of some UN resolution or strikes back against an outrage like the killing of the bus passengers on Thursday near Eilat?"

"Where, during the Syrian protest, were the massed student armies from York University and Concordia and the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education? Where were the legions of academics and trade unionists who are always ready to declare what policy should be followed by the wise and the virtuous?"

Number of clients nearly double since 2004

Federation provides financial support to the Jewish poor

The federation does hand out financial support to the Jewish poor directly through JIAS [Jewish Immigrant Aid Services] and JF&CS [Jewish Family and Child] programs, and through its annual Global Seder to Fight Hunger, he said.

When the food bank has to buy its food, it uses cash donated from Mazon Canada, some Toronto synagogues, and Jewish service clubs including B'nai Brith's Don Mills and Forestdale Heights lodges.

Winer is one of a team of 14 volunteers who pack the food into bags for distribution.

"We used to have so much food, but now it's dwindled down," said kosher food bank founder Katy Brass.

Yet the number of clients is nearly double what it was in 2004. At that time, the food bank was serving 65 to 85 people per week. On the day this reporter visited, the volunteers had nearly 400 bags ready to hand out.

"It's just sad. They gave out [food] to 130 [people] last week," Winer said. "Oh my gosh!"

A report by Jewish Family and Child says that of the 180,000 Jewish people who live in the Toronto area, 20,000 live in poverty. That's nine per cent, using the latest statistics from the 2006 Canadian Census. Referrals come from JIAS, the Bernard Betel Centre and other social services agencies.

"We'd like to get that percentage down," Shulman said, adding there hasn't been a significant change in the numbers in the five years since the report was done.

The food bank's location in the library of the synagogue is another attraction for some of the clients, including a tanned woman in a white blouse and black skirt, who didn't want her name used.

"I like to come to the synagogue. I like to pray," she said. "[And] they give tons."

On the lawn outside the food bank, she sorted through the grocery bags, removed two cans of beans, and gave them to another client.

"Where would I put them?" she said, explaining that she had some left over from her last visit and had no space.

She told me she lives with a man who receives assistance for the rent and for his disability. It's her job to carry the food bags home each week. Like her, most of the people who use the Pride of Israel food bank live in the apartments nearby and walk there, pulling their grocery buggies.

"I help three old women in the building with this food," said Voinov, who comes from his apartment on Sheppard Avenue.

Picking up food for other people is probably against the rules, but volunteers like Dorothy Tress do what they can. For example, a frail Russian-speaking man turned up with his daughter's papers again. His own documents have out-of-date information, which should have made him ineligible for food donations for the past two months.

"I told him, 'It's the last time,'" Tress said. Then she started looking for extra lollipops to hand out to the children in line.

On this day, clients received three Sobeys bags of food: one contained cans of kidney beans, elbow macaroni, pasta sauce and a tin of sardines. The second held Shredded Wheat cereal and mayonnaise, cookies and rice. The third bag had bread rolls from Grodzinski Bakery and, in nearly half the bags, some frozen turkey donated by Chai Kosher.

"The deep freezer only holds 60 to 65 pieces, so we don't have enough [meat] to feed everybody," Brass said, pointing to the appliance stored in the pantry behind the synagogue's main office.

Space is a constant problem, but so are supplies. Right now, Brass said they are running low on new plastic grocery bags.

They have to be new because of kashrut rules, she explained. With recycled bags, "you don't know what's been in them."

Jewish food banks in Toronto

Staffed entirely by volunteers, Toronto's Intersynagogue Kosher Food Bank opened in 1999 through the efforts of seven Toronto synagogues – Adath Israel, Beth Tikvah, Beth Torah, Beth Tzedec, Beth Sholom, Pride of Israel and Temple Sinai, according to the UJA of Greater Toronto's website.

It aims to provide wholesome food to the needy in our community in a dignified manner.

There are two locations: The food bank at Beth Sholom Synagogue, 1445 Eglinton Ave. W., 416-783-6103, is open Wednesday mornings from 10:30 to 11:30 a.m. It's closed during the summer

The northern food bank at Pride of Israel Synagogue, 59 Lissom Cres., 416-226-0111, is open Wednesday mornings throughout the year.

Don't walk into a custody battle alone

Family Matters
by John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator
for 30 years

Question: Exactly what happens and what can proceedings cost in a custody dispute? Can I do this without a lawyer?

Answer: I don't know. Can you perform surgery on yourself? A parent should not go to trial without a lawyer. To succeed, you need intimate familiarity with family law rules, the rules of evidence, including the Evidence Act, child support guidelines, the Family Law Act and the Divorce Act, You also need to understand certain traditions of legal interpretation that courts understand and apply at a trial.

One also requires knowledge of the rules of advocacy. In children's disputes, usually an expert is retained to support one's position on where a child should live primarily. At trial, a parent not versed in the law won't have any idea how to support or attack an expert's views on parenting. The cost can be high, so mediate it or settle. But, if you have to go to trial, don't try this on your own.

I presume that, whatever your occupation or profession, you take pride in your work and can do a far better job at it than someone who lacks your experience and expertise. Yet acting on your own behalf instead of hiring a competent family law lawyer is like your employer replacing you with someone off the street. It could save you money...or be the most expensive decision you ever make. I repeat, not for my sake but for yours...if you have to go to trial, don't try this on your own.

Question: I have two children, but I moved to Alberta for medical and other reasons some time ago. My husband knew about the move for several months. However, he obtained a court order for interim custody to have the children returned to Ontario, but did not take them. Rather, he withheld enforcement of the order on the condition that he did not have to pay child support. In addition, I had to pay his legal fee of $3,800.

At first he voluntarily started making some payments. But now he says he wants to reinstate the old custody order to take the children away from me. He obviously lied when he said he would "rescind" the Ontario court Order if I did not "bug" him about child support. The problem is that legal aid says I earn too much for a Legal Aid certificate but I don't earn enough money to retain a lawyer. He's going back to court with the old court order and, not knowing enough about the law, I'm worried he will succeed and I will lose my kids. What am I to do?

Answer: You have a very common problem. For many who have modest incomes, Legal Aid is unavailable. However, even a reasonably priced competent lawyer just costs too much, especially for single parents who have no one to run to for help. You could try to represent yourself, but I honestly cannot advise you to do so for the reasons cited in the foregoing Q&A. The courts are being deluged with self-represented parents and spouses who haven't the slightest idea of the procedure or the law. Judges are now often put into the unenviable position of having to explain both law and procedure to litigants.

I would advise you to seek out a competent family law lawyer for an introductory consultation, in which he can at least lay out your options and give you an idea of the costs involved. Knowing your options with, at the very least, allay some of your concerns and anxiety.

Cardiologist joins surgical team in Tanzania

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Israel-based humanitarian organization Save a Child's Heart (SACH) made history earlier this month when a team of volunteer surgeons performed the first pediatric open-heart surgery in Mwanza, Tanzania.

Gil Gross, a cardiologist at the Hospital for Sick Children in Toronto, spent a week in Mwanza as part of a SACH mission to screen African children with heart defects.

Gross saw about 300 children – 11 of whom received heart surgery at the Bugando hospital in Mwanza, which were performed by SACH lead surgeon Lior Sasson and assisted by Godwin Godfrey, a local surgeon who has been training at the Wolfson Medical Centre in Israel for the past three years.

Children who urgently need heart surgery but did not receive it during the Mwanza mission will be flown to Israel in the near future for the free, life-saving surgery.

SACH has an agreement with Wolfson that allows volunteer surgeons to use the hospital's facilities, provided SACH covers the $10,000 it costs to perform the surgery.

Laurencia Simon, a four-year-old girl who was diagnosed with congenital heart disease when she was two, was the first to receive pediatric heart surgery in Mwanza.

A lack of infrastructure, finances and training prevented Tanzanian doctors from performing open-heart surgery on young children. But the SACH medical team worked to create an operating room that would meet the conditions necessary for such surgeries.

Cardiologist Dr. Gil Gross screened hundreds of children during his volunteer mission to Mwanza with Save a Child's Heart.

Since the operation on Aug. 3, Laurencia is now recovering well.

Gross, who was in Tanzania from July 31 to Aug. 7, was part of the team that included Akiva Tamir, SACH's chief cardiologist and head of Wolfson's pediatric cardiology unit, Sasson and Godfrey.

He said they spent the week screening scores of children to determine who should get the surgery on site at the Bugando hospital and who should be transferred to Israel for an operation.

Gross, who learned about SACH through his connections with many Israeli pediatric cardiologists, including Tamir, said he was thrilled to be a part of this recent mission, which he felt was more ambitious than previous SACH missions.

"Most of their other missions in Africa and in eastern Europe and so on don't involve the surgical part at all. They involve the screening part, where they just send the cardiologists to screen the kids and then they bring the kids to Israel for surgery," Gross said.

"This mission was on a much bigger scale."

Having never worked in Tanzania, Gross said he wasn't sure what to expect in terms of the conditions and resources.

"I saw conditions that I haven't encountered before that were interesting and unusual for someone who is used to practicing in North America," he said.

"Some of it was worse than expected, some of it was better than expected."

He said that despite living in impoverished villages, almost everyone owned a cellphone.

"I was surprised by how accessible the patients were."

Gross said it was hard for him to come to terms with the fact that so many children in the region were dying from heart defects that would be treated routinely in North America.

"When you're there and you see the kinds of preventable and treatable things that kids die from, that's hard. Even if you sort of know about it in advance, and you expect it, it's a very hard thing to see."

Even with the funds provided by SACH, the resources are so limited, Gross added, "that you find yourself making Solomonic judgments about who lives and who dies, who is going to get a chance and who is not going to get a chance. That is very hard."

The decision is based on who is most likely to benefit and recover from the procedure.

"There were kids we saw who were clearly beyond help and yet their parents brought them from far, far away just so we could look at them... They would bring them 500 kilometres even though they know that it's a desperate condition."

While some of the encounters with his patients were discouraging, others were uplifting and motivational.

"There was one child I saw who had surgery in Israel about two years before and this was a followup visit. The child had a fairly serious condition and had a great operation and was doing amazingly well," he said.

"You could really see the impact of the work that is being done. The family was very happy, the child was doing great and that was really an inspiring, motivating encounter."

Gross, who described SACH's goal as "very noble," said that although there are countless other causes to champion, SACH is important because it sees "each of these kids as a human being and they do deserve a chance."

Following the surgical mission, Godfrey, as well as three Torontonians, were among a team of SACH doctors, volunteers and supporters who climbed Mount Kilimanjaro, Africa's highest peak.

The climb was organized in an effort to raise $1 million to fund 100 heart surgeries for African children.

U.S. will veto UN bid, official says

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The United States will stop all financial aid to the Palestinian Authority if they proceed with plans to ask the United Nations for recognition of an independent state in September, a U.S. official warned last Friday.

The U.S. Consul General in Jerusalem, Daniel Rubinstein, told chief Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat that the United States would veto a UN Security Council resolution calling for recognition of an independent Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip within the June 4, 1967 borders and for UN membership.

"If the Palestinian Authority insists on going to the Security Council, the U.S. will use the veto," he told Erekat during a meeting in the West Bank city of Jericho, according to a statement issued by Erekat's office.

"And in case the Palestinian Authority seeks to upgrade its position at the UN through the General Assembly, the U.S. Congress will take punitive measures against it, including a cut in U.S. aid," he said.

Rubinstein said his country sees the Palestinians' UN bid as "useless," and that it would be better to conclude a peace agreement with Israel through direct negotiations, according to Erekat.

Erekat said U.S. support for the Palestinian UN bid would actually enhance the two-state solution and peace in the Middle East.

He called on the U.S. to reconsider its position on the issue because "the right decision is to support Palestine's membership of the UN."

Erekat, who had also met with the European Union's representative to the Palestinian Authority, Christian Burger, also urged Europe to support Palestinian efforts to get full membership of the UN.

The European Union, he said, "should take the correct position, not the easy position."

The EU has not yet decided which way it will go when the issue comes up for discussion at the Security Council in September. Some member states, such as Spain, have said they would support the Palestinian step.

If the United States vetoes the Security Council resolution, the Palestinians plan to ask the UN General Assembly to vote on the resolution, which needs a two-thirds majority to pass.

Is peace with Egypt threatened?

Leslie Susser
JTA

Analysis

Last week's multifront Palestinian terrorist attack along the Egyptian-Israeli border highlighted two major new challenges to Israel's national security.

The first is the breakdown of Egyptian central authority in the Sinai Peninsula, which has created fertile ground for terrorism against Israel. Complicating matters further is a heightened sensitivity in post-Mubarak Egypt to Israeli retaliation, especially if it entails action in territory nominally controlled by Egypt.

If not carefully managed, the twin challenges could bring the Israeli-Egyptian peace treaty, a cornerstone of regional stability for over three decades, into question, Israeli analysts say.

In separate interviews on Israel Radio, former generals Giora Eiland and Yisrael Ziv both argued that the top priority for Israel now is to take care to prevent any erosion in the peace with Egypt. Nahum Barnea, senior political analyst for Israel's daily Yediot Achronot, expanded on the theme.

"What is at stake," Barnea wrote Monday, "is: how can Israel help the new Egyptian regime fend off the street pressure to cancel the peace treaty with Israel?"

Ever since former Egyptian president Hosni Mubarak's ouster last February, the Sinai has been in a state of virtual anarchy. Any semblance of order that existed under Mubarak has been eroded. Scores of terrorists from Gaza and farther afield have been able to move in the area with impunity. Arms smuggling through the Sinai to Gaza – always a problem – has reached unprecedented levels. The pipeline carrying Egyptian natural gas to Israel has been sabotaged five times since February.

In order to enable the Egyptians to reassert their control, Israeli officials indicate that they may be willing to consider an amendment to the Egyptian-Israeli peace accords to allow a stronger Egyptian military presence in Sinai, close to the border with Israel and in the key area along the border with Gaza. A week before the terrorist attack, Israel agreed to the deployment of an additional 1,000 Egyptian troops in the sensitive area, despite treaty limitations that allow for only a few hundred lightly armed policemen to ensure that the Sinai never again becomes a staging ground for an Egyptian assault against Israel.

Israeli military analysts say that much will depend on the degree to which the Egyptian forces are willing to take on the smugglers and the terrorists.

Until now, soldiers in the Sinai or lightly armed policemen closer to the border have been taking kickbacks to look the other way. Without a change in attitude, simply beefing up Egyptian forces will not solve the problem, Israeli analysts say. Indeed, some of the Gaza terrorists who fired on Israeli vehicles last week operated unhindered close to an Egyptian military position, they noted. (After this analysis was written, it was reported that Israel will allow more Egyptian troops to be deployed in the Sinai to keep order there.)

Even more worrying for Israel than the danger of having terrorists roaming freely around the Sinai is the potential threat the new situation poses to the peace with Egypt. In the Aug. 18 exchanges of fire with the terrorists, three Egyptian border policemen were killed. Although it is not yet clear how they died, the Egyptians were quick to blame Israel and demand an apology. The incident sparked angry demonstrations outside the Israeli Embassy in Cairo, where one protester scaled the building to tear down the Israeli flag and replace it with an Egyptian one.

What makes this particularly troubling for Israel is that in the new Egypt, a product of the Arab Spring that has given greater weight to the voice of the people, the country's new leaders will have to take the widespread popular animosity toward Israel into account. This, the analysts say, could bring the peace treaty with Israel under review.

Still, for all the public debate on the issue in Egypt, most experts do not anticipate a new Egyptian government abrogating the peace treaty with Israel in the near future.

They point out that the two countries still share common interests – for example, a quiet Sinai, where forces like Al Qaeda, which also threaten Egypt, are neutralized. More importantly, the Egyptians know that if they cancel the peace treaty with Israel, they will forfeit the huge economic and military aid package they have been receiving from the United States since the treaty was signed under American auspices in 1979.

At one point during the current crisis, when the Egyptians appeared to threaten to recall their ambassador from Tel Aviv, the United States reportedly warned that if they went ahead, some of the aid would be withheld. The Egyptians quickly dialed down the rhetoric. On Monday, the Egyptian foreign minister, Mohammed Kamel Amr, denied that a recall of the ambassador was ever on the table.

Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak, centre, is briefed by the military's chief of staff, Benny Gantz, on Barak's left, in southern Israel after terrorists armed with heavy weapons, guns and explosives launched four co-ordinated attacks in quick succession, killing eight people last month near the border with Egypt's Sinai Peninsula. The attackers targeted a passenger bus, a military patrol and a private car. [Israel Sun photo]

A key element that has already changed, however, is Egypt's attitude toward Hamas, which controls Gaza. Mubarak's Egypt strongly opposed Hamas, seeing it as extremist and within the Iranian orbit.

Egypt's new leaders are far less hostile toward both Iran and Hamas. They've used their closer ties with Hamas to create a potentially important role for themselves as mediator – both in matters concerning captive Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit and in negotiating a ceasefire to end the current round of hostilities.

In the wake of last week's terrorist attack, which left eight Israelis dead, Israel moved quickly to assassinate the leaders of the Popular Resistance Committees, the group behind the attack. That led to several days of missile, rocket and mortar fire on southern Israeli towns and cities, and sporadic Israeli air raids on Hamas and other militia targets in Gaza. On Monday, however, things quieted down – though the rocket attacks did not stop completely – after Egypt helped to broker a halt to the hostilities.

Yoram Meital, a leading Israeli expert on Egypt at Ben-Gurion University, says the changes in Egypt have significantly altered the military equation between Israel and the Gaza militants.

For one thing, Palestinian action from Sinai puts Israel in a very tricky position, because if Israel hits back hard on Egyptian territory, it risks escalation with Egypt. Secondly, should Israel undertake a major military operation in Gaza, it is likely to encounter much firmer Egyptian censure than it did in Mubarak's day, given the predominant anti-Israel sentiment in today's Egypt.

Leaders of the Israel Defence Forces are thinking deeply about this. Over time, military planners say, Israel cannot afford to allow Gaza militants to use the Sinai as a launching pad for operations against Israel – precisely because that could lead to conflict with Egypt. At some point, they say, Israel will have to deal with the Palestinian terrorist infrastructure in Gaza itself and not in Sinai, to minimize the risk of a confrontation with Egypt.

Israeli officials are working behind the scenes with the Egyptians, primarily to ensure that whatever happens with Gaza or the Sinai won't compromise the peace treaty, perhaps the most important element of Israel's national security doctrine.

Anti-Israel rallies held in Iran

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iran staged anti-Israel rallies nationwide last Friday, state media reported.

According to state television, millions of people were expected to attend the state-run rallies throughout the country and voice their support for Palestinians and the "liberation of their lands from the Zionist regime's – Israel's – occupation." But merely a few hundred turned out for the rally in Tehran.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said that Iran was determined to eradicate Israel, ISNA news agency reported last Thursday.

"Iran believes that whoever is for humanity should also be for eradicating the Zionist regime [Israel] as [a] symbol of suppression and discrimination," Ahmadinejad said in an interview with a Lebanese television network, carried by ISNA.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

"Iran follows this issue [the eradication of Israel] with determination and decisiveness and will never ever withdraw from this standpoint and policy," the Iranian president added in the interview with the Al-Manar network.

The remarks by Ahmadinejad came one day before the annual anti-Israeli rallies named Quds [Jerusalem] Day, which are held nationwide in Iran on the last Friday of the fasting month of Ramadan.

On the Monday prior, he said that Iranians and Muslim nations worldwide should hold Quds rallies and show their willingness to dispose of this "infectious tumour and this regime full of rascality."

The late supreme leader of the 1979 Islamic Revolution, Grand Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, declared the last Friday of the fasting month of Ramadan to be Jerusalem Day and called for annual mass rallies against Israel and in support of the Palestinians.

The Iranian president provoked international condemnation in 2005 when he said that Israel should be eliminated from the map of the Middle East and transferred to Europe or North America.

Ahmadinejad said Friday that the Holocaust was a "big lie" used to justify establishment of the state of Israel.

"The Zionist regime's establishment was based on numerous deceptions and lies and one of the biggest lies was the Holocaust," Ahmadinejad said in a speech after an anti-Israel rally in Tehran and other Iranian cities.

"On the one hand we have the Zionist regime as the global axis of thieves and murderers and on the other hand we have the Quds Day, which is the axis of those seeking freedom, justice and end of suppression," the president reiterated Friday at Tehran University.

The international isolation of the Islamic republic escalated after Ahmadinejad held a Holocaust conference in 2006 in which he questioned whether the killing of six million Jews in Europe during World War II actually happened.

Libyan reaches out to Israel

Arbib said he knew Shebani's father, a former minister in the government of King Idris that preceded the 42-year regime of Moammar Gadhafi. He met Shebani in Dubai a few years ago "and we've kept in touch ever since. He felt Jews were an integral part of the country."

"He's a democrat," Arbib said.

Shebani was widely quoted last week playing an unlikely diplomatic card, reaching out to Israel for assistance.

"We are asking Israel to use its influence in the international community to end the tyrannical regime of Gadhafi and his family," he told Ha'aretz. "Libya needs any help it can get from the international community, including from Israel," said Shebani.

His message toward Israel was certainly conciliatory: "The Democratic Party of Libya wishes to establish a functioning democracy similar to Israel's. We feel the only democratic state in the region is Israel," he told The CJN.

Shebani, who calls himself "a cyber rebel," asserted that only a democratic Libya could normalize relations with Israel.

To aid in the transition to democracy and to assist in "nation-building," Shebani called for UN intervention. The blueprint for such a role is the Adrian Pelt UN Commission, which was established by the General Assembly in 1949 to help prepare Libya for independence.

UN involvement would lead to a democratic Libya, return of civil society – which Gadhafi destroyed – and a healthy economy. It would be followed by a "truth and reconciliation commission" modelled on South Africa, with the goal of heading off a civil war. Shebani called on the Canadian government to use its influence at the UN to pursue those goals.

"The central problem [in Libya] is the separation between state and church," he said. Shebani said Libya's Interim National Council shouldn't be relied upon to usher in a democratic environment. Although supported by NATO, which flew some 2,000 sorties against Gadhafi forces, the council is rife with Islamic fundamentalists, he asserted.

John Thompson, executive director of the Mackenzie Institute, a think-tank that focuses on terrorism and security issues, agreed that the Libyan opposition is saturated with Islamic radicals. Among them are veterans of the Afghanistan war of the 1980s, who were influenced by Wahhabi extremism and who have returned to Libya to fight Gadhafi.

In addition, the opposition is splintered along tribal lines, while a "frustrated middle class" remains powerless. As in other revolutions, "it is the committed, ideological cadres with the agenda for power" who usually come out on top, Thompson said.

As for Shebani, Thompson pointed out he has lived outside Libya for many years. "He's in contact with very few addresses in the Libyan street," although he might have access to information outsiders would not necessarily share, Thompson said.

Israel Briefs

'Not one grain of sand'

Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah called on the Palestinians not to give up on a "grain of sand or drop of water" in their fight for a state, as Jerusalem Day anti-Israel protests were held throughout the Muslim world last Friday to show support for the Palestinian cause. The late supreme leader of the 1979 Islamic Revolution, Grand Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, declared the last Friday of the fasting month of Ramadan to be Quds, or "Jerusalem Day," and called for annual mass rallies against Israel and in support of the Palestinians. "Jerusalem is becoming more and more Jewish every day, but as far as we are concerned, Palestine is from the [Mediterranean] ocean to the [Jordan] river, and no one has any right to give up one grain of its land or one drop of its water," Nasrallah said in Lebanon.

Terror in Tel Aviv

Eight people were wounded in south Tel Aviv early Monday when a Palestinian from Nablus ran over policemen with a stolen taxi, exited the vehicle and stabbed additional people. The perpetrator was also lightly wounded as police struggled to arrest him. Tel Aviv District Commander Aharon Eksol said the attack was "definitely an act of terror."

Azrieli investment in Granite Hacarmel in the red

Michael Rochvarger
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — A sharp eye for real estate earned Montrealer David Azrieli the title of shopping mall king, and exploiting opportunities in the financial arena just before markets recovered in 2009, including the purchase of a 4.8 per cent stake in Bank Leumi and about 18 per cent in Leumi Card, also added to his aura of success.

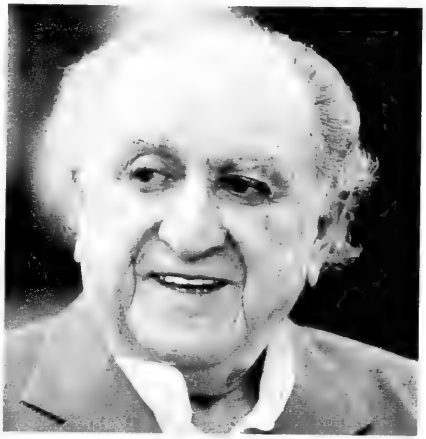
But Azrieli's strategic Granite Hacarmel Investments venture continues to disappoint.

Granite Hacarmel is a holding company operating mainly in the fields of energy, water and construction finishing, through companies such as Sonol, Tambour, Super Gas and GES. In November 2006, the Azrieli group acquired the controlling shares of the conglomerate from the Borovich family, topping competing bids from Meir Shamir, Shlomo Shmeltzer and other investors. Shortly afterward, it raised its stake in the company, buying another block of shares from Yeshayahu Landau.

Azrieli spent 740 million shekels ($203 million) acquiring 61 per cent of Granite Hacarmel's shares, but the company is currently trading at a total market valuation of just 770 million shekels ($211 million). Azrieli's share of this comes to 490 million shekels ($134 million), including 25 million shekels ($6.8 million) in dividends distributed by Granite – a negative 33 per cent return on his investment.

Over the same period of time the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange's TA-100 index, which includes Granite, has gained six per cent. Until the beginning of this year Azrieli's investment maintained its value, but has since shed over 30 per cent due to market events and a challenging business environment.

When Yossi Singer, a partner and former CEO at financial and economics consulting firm Giza Singer Even, replaced Ami Segis as CEO of Granite Hacarmel three years ago, he was eager to turn the company into one of the market's most interesting and successful holding concerns.



David Azrieli

At the start of his term, Granite divested from several non-core and disappointing businesses, such as truck imports and marketing, electric scooters, natural gas infrastructure in Serbia and some real estate, absorbing losses in the process. It was then that Granite decided to focus on energy, construction and water.

In an interview in September 2009, Singer denied claims that the Azrieli group's investment in the company hadn't borne fruit, saying, "Anyone claiming it hasn't been a success is mistaken. It's true that a lot more needs to be done, but I am completely convinced that within several years, Granite will become of the market's most interesting investment companies.

"Even this corner of the huge mesh of businesses comprising the Azrieli group will become an asset to take pride in, and in terms of providing value to the owners. In my opinion the global crisis provides Granite with a chance to substantially improve and upgrade its market position. From report to report, you can see how we are upgrading the company."

Granite hasn't leveraged itself and is weathering the crisis relatively well, with first-half reports revealing that all its companies registered improved earnings before interest, taxes, depreciation and amortization. All this, however, has boiled down to a miserly 3 million shekels ($822,000) profit in the second quarter and 35 million shekels ($9.6 million) for the first half of the year – figures that don't do justice to a company with a 5 billion-shekel ($1.37-billion) balance sheet and controlling interest with a track record like Azrieli's.

Even taking into account the current market crisis, the fact that Sonol, a gas station operator, is in a market beset by heavy regulation and eroding sales margins, the unfulfilled potential of water business deals, where the Azrieli group hung so much of its hopes – with the exception of the Palmahim desalination plant – results remain disappointing.

Azrieli is considered a solid concern that is in the race for the long stretch, but Singer must also realize that the point is approaching when he'll be asked to provide the goods. For Azrieli, this investment could prove a lesson that it's best to focus strategically on areas where specialized experience is proven, and that diversifying in new directions doesn't always pan out.

Lack of competition in Israel deplored

Shelly Appelberg
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — The proportion of Israelis living below the poverty line is triple the average in the rest of the western world, Yaron Zelekha told an audience of 500 people at the Ono Academic College last week in a speech interrupted repeatedly by enthusiastic applause.

"The division of wealth in Israel is so discriminatory that other than the United States, there is no country that distributes income in such unequal fashion," the former Finance Ministry accountant general and professor of economics said.

"Being middle class in Israel means supporting a family on 5,000 shekels [a month $1,370], and that's absurd," he said, adding that only 53 per cent of the potential workforce is actually employed, compared to more than 60 per cent in other western countries.

"Governments bandy about numbers that are not correct. They are lying in our faces when they simply don't count most of the unemployed," Zelekha told the audience.

The people involved in the current wave of social protest should not engage in a discussion about the state budget, which would ensnarl them in intentional deception on the government's part, he warned. "The government's budget is limited because the economy is limited. The budget is allocated and cannot vary by more than 10 billion shekels ($2.7 billion). The budget is the result of the problem, not its origin," Zelekha implored.

Yaron Zelekha

"The heart of the problem is the lack of competitiveness in sectors of the economy in which [Israeli] households spend 500 billion shekels ($137 billion) every year," Zelekha said. "There are dozens of countries in Africa and Asia where they buy services more cheaply than we do. Each percentage [of control] of monopolies and oligopolies has cost us 5 billion shekels ($1.37 billion) a year, every year. We have to demand it back."

"From the moment we break up the monopolies, prices will drop, purchasing power will increase, the government will have more revenue from taxes and then we can lower indirect taxes. And most importantly, we shouldn't do stupid things with macroeconomics. We have given a policy preference to capital over work," he said.

Liquid eyeliner that recalls the '60s look is back. Lips are vampy and come in shades of red to burgundy to dark purple. Rosy cheeks are hot! Dark nails are nothing new for the colder months ahead, but what's different this year is that those dark colours are very dark, almost black. Deep plum, dark graphite and rich navy are making a statement.

This September, Clarins introduces a new-generation formula, the Everlasting Compact Foundation SPF15. This foundation has a smooth, silky texture that provides you with instant pleasure, leaving your complexion homogenous and your skin comfortable. The result is instantly even makeup coverage with no mask effect and no pulling.

Acceptance into TIFF is a lifelong dream

Jennifer Libman
Special to The CJN

Yonah Lewis has been working toward his dream of being in the Toronto International Film Festival since he was 12 years old.

Two weeks ago, it was announced that his film Amy George had been accepted into the festival, in a category celebrating first-time Canadian filmmakers.

Lewis, 25, made his first attempt at becoming a famous director when he was 12 and decided to film a production of Macbeth. He gathered as many children as he could in his Hamilton neighbourhood, and when the lead actor proved to be unreliable, Lewis replaced him with his own father, Robert.

"I was not exactly your average kid," Lewis said.

Even though this first attempt at filmmaking was ultimately a failure, Lewis was not discouraged.

"From the very start, my family was incredibly supportive. They saw that this was something I wanted to do, and they stood by me. How many fathers out there would agree to put on a kilt and play Macbeth in the middle of a neighourhood?"

Lewis was home-schooled as a child, and much of his education was dedicated to the arts. He was always interested in filmmaking, but it was during his first summer at Centauri Summer Arts Camp in the Niagara region of Ontario, that he caught the bug, he said. "Centauri created an environment that really fostered my creativity. I loved how I was able to combine writing, producing, acting and directing into one piece."

He spent a lot of time in his teen years creating short films, and returned to Centauri for several summers as a camper, and then as a staff member.

Lewis and his family eventually relocated to Toronto, and he enrolled in the media arts program at Sheridan College.

Yonah Lewis, right, with Amy George actor Gabriel del Castillo Mullally

"I had no doubt that I wanted to pursue filmmaking professionally, but the idea of going to school was so I could meet like-minded individuals."

During his time at Sheridan, Lewis met his filmmaking partner Calvin Thomas. They both graduated in 2008 and began working on feature-length films. "It was a real learning process, and each script we wrote was progressively better than the last.

"We approached breaking into the world of film in a different way than many other film students. Lots of people think the best way to learn about the industry is by working on a film set or by assisting another director. The problem is, one day they wake up and they're 40 years old and still someone's assistant. The one advantage of being young is that you get to take risks – you can try to go out on your own, and at my age, it's a lot easier to bounce back after an unsuccessful attempt," Lewis said.

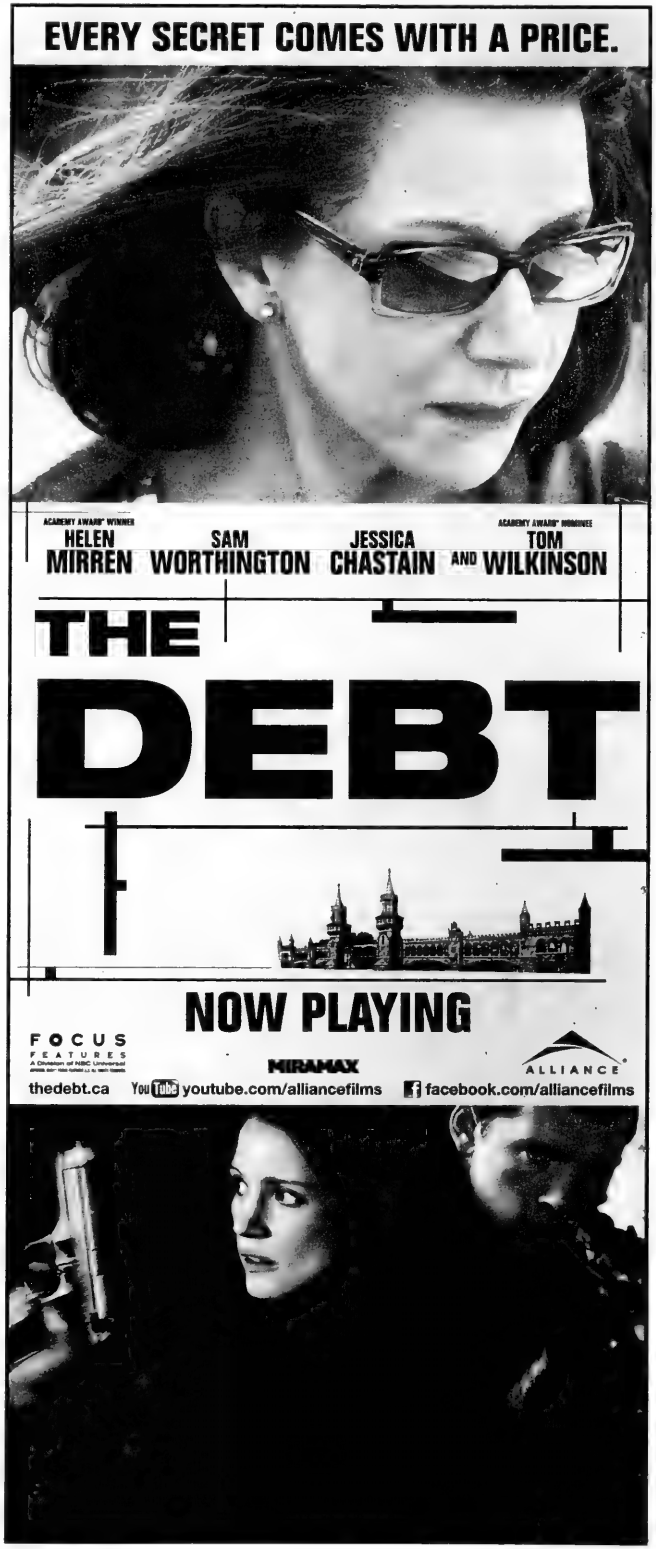
After six abandoned screenplays, Lewis and Thomas came up with Amy George. In February 2010, they began writing the script, and the filming began just three months later. The story takes place in the Riverdale area of Toronto, the neighbourhood where Lewis currently lives, and is about a 12-year-old boy who is worried that his middle-class upbringing has left him unprepared for his dreams of becoming an artist.

"We created Amy George in a way that everything was accessible to us. It takes place in the neighbourhood I live in, and every scene, whether it was in a car or in a store, were things we knew we could access. I even had my 19-year-old brother, Lev, create the music for the movie. We wanted to write something that we could feasibly film, without a large budget."

Lewis and Thomas raised money from their family and friends to support the project. Their biggest investor was a 15-year-old boy whom Lewis has taught about filmmaking at Centauri. "It was just amazing how everyone believed in our film," Lewis said. "The amount of support was overwhelming.

"I was completely dumbfounded when I found out [that the film was accepted]," Lewis said. "Even after hanging up the phone, I was convinced that it was a mistake. I'm still coming to terms with what it means. This has truly been a lifelong dream.

"To be part of prestigious film festival is always an honour, but the fact that it takes place in Toronto makes it even more special. Now we get to share our success with all of our friends and family and everyone who was involved in the film. We can't wait to see where it goes from here."



A visceral, realistic film about the Holocaust

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Agnieszka Holland's In Darkness is a raw, visceral, unsettling descent into the dark maw of the Holocaust.

Adapted for the screen by David Shamoon from Robert Marshall's book In the Sewers of Lvov, this jolting drama cum-thriller will be presented at the Toronto International Film Festival on Sept. 11, at 6 p.m. at the Elgin and Sept. 12, at 3:30 p.m. at the Scotiabank 3.

Based on a true story, In Darkness takes place over a 14-month period in Nazi-occupied Lvov, a multiethnic city in Poland inhabited by Poles, Ukrainians and Jews.

Holland dedicates it to Marek Edelman, one of the commanders of the 1943 Warsaw Ghetto Uprising who survived the ordeal, and the 6,000 or so Polish Christians whom Yad Vashem has designated as Righteous Among by Nations.

From almost the first moment, she creates a mood of sheer, unbridled terror.

Naked Jewish women, terrorized by pursuers with guns, race for their lives through an autumn forest. German soldiers humiliate an Orthodox Jew by forcing him to do a little dance. A soldier brutally cuts off the black beard of a frightened Jewish man.

As the Nazis impose their reign of terror, Leopold (Poldek) Socha, a Polish sewer worker, stumbles upon a small group of Jews who've descended into the subterranean depths to save themselves in advance of the liquidation of the Lvov ghetto.

Socha (Robert Wieckiewicz, in a strong, nuanced performance) is a petty thief who cynically regards their presence in the dank, labyrinthine sewer system as a golden opportunity to enrich himself.

In exchange for ample payments, Socha agrees to find them a safe hiding place and supply them with food and water. He knows he and his family will face execution if the Germans and their Ukrainian collaborators uncover his scheme, but he's ready to take that risk.

Since antisemitism runs rife in Lvov, no one will be surprised that Socha is a bigot. "Give a Jew a finger and he'll take your arm," he blurts out at one point. Bortnik, a Ukrainian policeman and a Nazi collaborator, is even more antisemitic, claiming that Germany's occupation is good for Ukrainians and Poles alike.

Robert Wieckiewicz plays a sewer worker in Nazi-occupied Lvov in the Polish film In Darkness.

As the film unfolds, in a mix of Polish, German, Yiddish and Ukrainian with English subtitles, the Germans proceed with emptying the ghetto. Holland inserts powerful scenes of Jewish men, women and children being rounded up in a blur of sickening movement. The soundtrack is full of screaming, shouting and shooting as fear and panic grip the hapless Jewish deportees.

With the Jews having been taken away, heartless scavengers search for "ghetto souvenirs," household goods left behind by Jews on the sidewalks.

In Darkness, however, is not permeated exclusively by vile antisemites. In an attempt to achieve a measure of balance, Holland introduces a sympathetic character whose personality seems defined by empathy and humanity. Wanda, Socha's wife, describes the Jewish deportees as "these poor people" and observes they are "the same as us."

Socha resists her cri de coeur. Saying his priest told him that Jews crucified Jesus, he leaves the distinct impression that they deserve their terrible fate. In a signal of his possible intentions, he points out that people are making "easy money" turning in Jews to the Germans.

Much of In Darkness – Poland's entry for best foreign film at the 2012 Academy Awards – is shot in the dim, claustrophobic confines of the sloshy, smelly, rat-infested sewers.

Here, life goes on, in a manner of speaking. Personal disputes break out, class differences rise to the surface, romances emerge and sexual passions are unleashed.

And while Holland takes pains to reenact these human impulses, she is particularly interested in charting the course of Socha's gradual transformation from opportunist to hero, the theme at the very heart of the film.

Playing fast and loose with his life, he kills a German soldier to help a Jew, goes out of his way to find Jewish children lost in the sewer and redirects "his" Jews to a safer hideout in the sewer.

More amazingly, he performs a series of good deeds that may startle a viewer. Holland does not bother explaining Socha's metamorphosis, but it is clearly touching.

As movies about the Holocaust go, In Darkness is one of the better ones. Vividly realistic and reasonably well directed, it is ultimately soul crushing.

Footnote is a first-rate Israeli film

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Joseph Cedar's drama, Footnote, sizzles with laser-sharp intensity.

This Israeli film about father-son rivalry, academia jealousy and the importance of family solidarity will be screened twice at the forthcoming Toronto International Film Festival.

The dates are Monday, Sept. 12, at 5:15 p.m. at the Bell Lightbox 2 and Wednesday, Sept. 14, at 2 p.m. at the AMC 10.

Footnote, which is set in Jerusalem, comes to Toronto with honours in hand, having won the Cannes Film Festival's best screenplay award.

The prize is richly deserved. One of the finest Israeli movies in recent years, it is propelled by an exceptionally fine script. Cedar, a master screenwriter, has directed sharply focused films such as Beaufort (an Oscar nominee), Time of Favour and Campfire.

Taking place mostly on the campus of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Footnote turns on Eliezer Shkolnik (Shlomo Bar Aba), a distinguished scholar of Talmud, and his son, Uriel (Lior Ashkenazi), who has followed in his footsteps.

Eliezer, played stoically by Bar Aba, a popular comedian in real life, is a loner, a man apart of few words whose claim to scholarly fame is a mere footnote in someone else's book.

Like a hermit, he spends his days in a dim library, poring over venerable Hebrew texts. As his son says in a revealing speech laced with self-deprecating humour, Eliezer is a quintessential teacher, utterly devoted to his research.

Although he is generally recognized as a first-rate scholar, the all-important Israel Prize has eluded him for the past 20 consecutive years.

For all his achievements in academia, Eliezer has problems relating to people. Indeed, his relationship with Uriel seems oddly competitive. At one point, after an exasperated Uriel describes his father as "weird," he says, "I have no idea who this man is."

Eliezer's long-suffering wife, Yehudit (Alisa Rosen), would probably agree. Their relations are cool and distant and they no longer share a bedroom.

Uriel, strongly portrayed by Ashkenazi, is the polar opposite of Eliezer in terms of personality. He is personable, talkative and accessible. A rising star in his field, he takes a much broader approach to Talmud than Eliezer, who appears caught up in minutiae.

Cedar, in bold brushstrokes, composes a plausible and compelling portrait of two radically different men related by blood but not by temperament.

The film, in a clever plot twist, grows taut and suspenseful when Uriel learns that he, rather than his father, is to be awarded the next Israel Prize.

The good news is tempered by incredibly bad news. At a tense meeting convened by the Israel Prize committee, Uriel is forced into a morally unpalatable quandary. At stake here is not only his career, but his father's well-being.

Simply put, no man should be placed in this kind of an agonizing and untenable position.

Cedar handles the dynamics of this potentially explosive situation with ease and aplomb.

Apart from the two lead players, the rest of the cast is superb. Micah Lewensohn is excellent as a spiteful professor who harbours a grudge against Eliezer, while Ala Zack is fine as Uriel's sensitive wife, Dikla. Yuval Scharf is appealing as a young reporter interviewing Eliezer for a profile.

Footnote is everything a movie of superior quality should be. It is immensely interesting and seamless. It is empathetic. The dialogue sparkles. The actors perform with energy, grace and precision.

Israeli cinema can be proud of this film.

KOFFLER COMBINES JEWISH BOOK FAIR AND CANADIAN JEWISH BOOK AWARDS

Toronto bibliophiles may have long wondered why the two major book events in the Jewish community's annual calendar – the Jewish Book Fair and the Helen and Stan Vine Canadian Jewish Book Awards – were kept as separate as meat and milk in a kosher kitchen, the one scheduled for the fall, the other for the spring.

The Koffler Centre of the Arts, which administers both events, has just announced a major reshuffling of its cultural calendar that will see the two events married into one and, as befitting a newly married couple, given a brand-new home.

The Koffler last week announced that the first annual Toronto Jewish Book Festival (the former Book Fair) will run June 4 to 7, 2012, in the swank Bram and Bluma Appel Salon on the second floor of the Toronto Reference Library.

The festival will feature the same great author talks and programs and books for sale as in previous years, and will culminate in the Helen and Stan Vine Canadian Jewish Book Awards on June 7.

While there will be no Jewish Book Fair this fall, something grand has been concocted to take its place. The Koffler @ IFOA will feature a full day of author talks at the International Festival of Authors at Harbourfront Centre on Oct. 23. Authors Gary Shteyngart, David Bezmozgis, Irwin Cotler, Gal Beckerman and Michal Govrin will focus on the theme of Russian-Jewish stories. www.kofflerarts.org

Songwriting legend co-wrote rock standards

JTA

Songwriter Jerry Leiber, who with composer Mike Stoller wrote such rock 'n' roll hits as Hound Dog, Stand By Me, and Jailhouse Rock, has died.

Leiber died Aug.21 at a hospital in Los Angeles of cardiopulmonary failure. He was 78.

Leiber and Stoller, who met as teenagers in the 1950s, wrote 200 hits that were performed by artists including Elvis Presley, Buddy Holly, the Beatles, the Rolling Stones, James Brown, B.B. King, the Drifters and Peggy Lee.

Leiber's first language was Yiddish, and he was frequently taunted as a child on the streets of Baltimore by a gang that called him "Jewboy."

"He was my friend, my buddy, my writing partner for 61 years," Stoller said in a statement. "He had a way with words. There was nobody better. I'm going to miss him."

Leiber and Stoller have been honoured by the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame, the Songwriters Hall of Fame and many other music organizations.

Veteran singer's roots in Yiddish music run deep

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

By his own telling, Jerry Gray had one of the most thrilling experiences of his life in late June. In front of a sold-out house at Toronto's Roy Thomson Hall, he stood at the conductor's podium, raised a baton, and led the 385-voice Mormon Tabernacle Choir and a full orchestra in a rousing rendition of This Land Is Your Land.

It has been 57 years since Gray, a founding member of the Canadian folk group The Travellers, co-wrote the Canadian lyrics of the Woody Guthrie folk classic, then repeatedly performed it with the band on a national television show called Pick the Stars, advancing through all the preliminary rounds of a national talent contest to finish in second place.

"It was no great writing feat, but the song fulfilled a huge purpose at the time," he recalls. "Canada was emerging from the post war and Canadians embraced the song. Every time we did that program we did a medley of Canadian songs, always ending with This Land Is Your Land. People heard it about 10 times that season. We beat out [comedian] Rich Little in the semifinals so it was quite a feather in our cap."

The band recorded the song in 1957 "and it got a huge response. It became a second national anthem in an emerging Canada that was trying to find its way artistically."

Gray's roots in Yiddish music run deep. His mother and sister sang with the Jewish Folk Choir, and he remembers watching the choir perform at Massey Hall in the 1940s with renowned guest artists like Paul Robeson and Jan Peerce. "I've always had this love of Yiddish music. When The Travellers started, we sang at Hillel House [at the University of Toronto]. We always were involved in Jewish causes and Yiddish. I've always done Yiddish music."

The Travellers first came together at Camp Naivelt, the Jewish secular leftist summer camp in Brantford where cottagers enjoyed singing Yiddish songs together and where Gray first learned to play the five-string banjo from visiting folk legend Pete Seeger. In the 1950s the band rode a rocket to national fame and stayed there for years, recording numerous albums and performing across Canada and internationally.

Over the years, The Travellers have played on many stages and shared billing with renowned artists ranging from Harry Belafonte to Judy Collins – and of course their friend and idol, Pete Seeger, for whom they played a 90th-birthday tribute at the Leah Posluns Theatre two years ago. They have played in the Soviet Union, Japan, Britain, Cyprus, Nunavut and many other places. This summer, as in previous years, Gray participated in KlezKanada, the annual festival of Jewish and Yiddish culture and the arts in Quebec's Laurentian Mountain region.

In 2010, Gray was awarded the annual Joe Hill Award for a lifetime of using folk songs to heighten social awareness. Seeger wrote a letter to the committee to recommend Gray for the award because of "his record of a half-century singing... By himself or with The Travellers, he's sung for many hundreds of thousands of working folks all across Canada."

Today Gray, at 77, looks back on a dual career as a folk artist and as a dentist, but while he has put away his dental implements, he is still strumming the banjo. Several years ago, he revitalized the band, calling it Jerry Gray and the Travellers because he is the only member of the original group still active in it. (One of his four sons, James, who played keyboard with Blue Rodeo for years, also occasionally plays with the band.) Gray also gives courses and guest lectures in folk and protest music at several universities near where he winters in Florida.

On Oct. 2 at 7:30 p.m., Jerry Gray and the Travellers perform This Land Is Your Land, a concert to celebrate the life and songs of Woody Guthrie to mark the 100th anniversary of the iconic songwriter's birth. Guest performers are to include members of the Guthrie family. The concert is at the Markham Theatre for the Performing Arts, and tickets are $50 and $70, with a portion of the proceeds going to the Guthrie Family Foundation. For tickets and information, e-mail grayg@rogers.com or phone 905-305-7469.

German soldier never lost his sense of decency

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff reporter

When World War II broke out on Sept. 1, 1939, Konrad Jarausch, a German high school teacher of religion and history, was drafted into the army.

He would spend the rest of his life as a soldier on the Polish and Russian fronts.

A witness to the Holocaust who died of typhoid fever on Jan. 27, 1942, Jarausch wrote 350 nuanced letters from the field from September 1939 to January 1942, mainly to his beloved wife, Elisabeth (Lotte).

In these letters, he described his experiences as a foot soldier and outlined his critique of Nazi policies.

Jarausch's son, Konrad, a historian who specializes in the Third Reich, has compiled a book about his father. It consists of a personal essay of his reflections and a selection of his father's letters.

The volume, Reluctant Accomplice: A Wehrmacht Soldier's Letters From the Eastern Front (Princeton University Press), is a revealing glimpse into the mind of a patriotic German who was skeptical of the Nazi leadership and soured on the fascist regime.

For Jarausch, letter writing was therapeutic, "a release from the frustrations of long hours of waiting, followed by frenetic activity," Richard Kohn, his son's colleague, writes in a foreword.

In the essay, his son – a professor at the University of North Carolina – admits that his father hovered over him like a phantom during his childhood.

As he puts it, "Since he was ordered back to the front three days before my birth in Magdeburg on Aug. 14, 1941, and passed away in a field hospital five months later, I was never able to see him in person, though he remained a constant presence in my life."

He explains that his father was ambivalent about the war during its opening phase, swinging between elation over Germany's early victories and despair about the final outcome.

"But he was also concerned that the surprising ease of the victory in Poland would reinforce a set of nationalist attitudes and racial prejudices that might eventually undermine German domination…"

In essence, Jarausch feared that SS atrocities would be counterproductive to the war effort.

"While still rejoicing in the initial German victory, he began to worry about the political consequences of the reprisals, shootings and ethnic cleansing during the Polish campaign," his son writes. Brutal Nazi policies, he notes, violated his "sense of humanism."

Jarausch was a man who inspired respect, his son says. "His colleagues were impressed by his critical intelligence, national and religious idealism and his meticulousness as a scholar."

Born in 1900, he was called for military service in the waning months of World War I, but was saved from going to the front by the armistice in November 1918.

He was glad to be drafted in 1939 because, as his son observes, "he wished to participate in a historic event that he had missed the first time around."

He was not a typical soldier, differing in age, education, interests and temperament from his comrades.

In a pen portrait, he describes his father as "an earnest, mature, responsible man caught up in a grand historical event" that he understood but increasingly lamented.

A social and political conservative, Jaruasch was skeptical of Nazi leaders, refusing to join the Nazi party. Although he supported the war and believed that Germany had a "civilizing mission" in eastern Europe, he disagreed with the Nazi's harsh methods, claiming nothing good could come from them. Eventually, Jarausch distanced himself from what his son calls the "Nazi project of racial hegemony.

Usually cool and detached in his letters, Jarausch often writes in an impartial style.

Konrad Jarausch in military uniform in 1939

But sometimes, his observations betray ingrained racism. For example, from Poland, he comments on the "miserable seediness" and "wretched humanity" of Jews.

In general, however, one detects a glint of empathy. Writing from the city of Lodz, he says, "The Jews held themselves back, casting sideways glances at our uniforms… Among them one finds single, small faces with burning expressions of intelligence. Every now and then one sees some elegance. But overall, there's just poverty and misery."

Having witnessed the hanging of three Jews in Lodz's main square, he wonders why they were condemned to death. In the next paragraph, he moves on effortlessly. "I'm doing fine personally," he reports. "We're outside a lot with the lovely, mild weather."

After commenting on the destruction of Jewish ritual baths and a synagogue by ethnic Germans in Lodz, he wonders "how most people can just ignore such things."

After noting that Jewish girls and women clean his barracks, he says, "The comrades behaved themselves. The Nuremberg race laws can perhaps serve to protect Jewish women. Things are pretty bad here with the Polish women."

A keen observer, he notices that while not every Jew in the Kalisch district must wear a yellow armband, the streets of Lodz are "crowded with them."

In a subsequent letter, he writes that the yellow armband has been replaced by a gold star.

Apparently not a person to turn a blind eye away from reality, Jarausch says that Polish Jews expelled from western Poland "live in horrible squalor and misery."

On a more general note, he lambasts the nature of Germany's occupation of the Soviet Union: "We are living at the expense of these people and are sucking them dry. What should we expect, other than bitterness and an abiding desire to overthrow this foreign rule? I don't understand how we can expect anything good to come of such circumstances." Judging by his letters, Jarausch appears to have been a decent German who refused to close his eyes to the crimes against humanity committed by the Nazis in Germany's name.

His son can be thankful that Konrad Jarausch never lost his innate sense of decency.

Toronto teams earn medals at youth games

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Two shots at medals, two medals won.

Not bad at all, especially when you consider that every one of the 20 athletes dispatched to the JCC Maccabi Games in Philadelphia came home with some sort of hardware.

The boys under-16 roller hockey team captured the bronze medal while the girls under-16 soccer team came away with the gold.

The two teams were the only Canadians to participate in the 2011 games in Philadelphia, which saw 1,700 athletes aged 13 to 16 in attendance. Other youth games were staged in Israel and Springfield, Mass.

Delegation head Alex Voihanski is satisfied with the performance of the Toronto athletes, but he acknowledged that Toronto's participation was modest by previous standards.

With all the changes the Toronto JCCs have experienced in recent years, the city's participation in the youth games has dropped precipitously in only a few years. Toronto used to send 60 or even 80 athletes to the competition, and Voihanksi is confident that next time around, Toronto will get back to those numbers, perhaps as early as next year.

As head of JCC Chai Sports, Voihanski and partner Jeremy Blustein have been charged with operating the JCC's sports programs. In recent years, Chai has developed youth-oriented sports programs in baseball, soccer, basketball and hockey and it is only recently getting around to making the JCC Maccabi event "a larger part of what we do... We're on the rebound."

Relying on his extensive contacts in the hockey community, Voihanski recruited a talented team of players for the roller hockey competition. Roller hockey is not that popular in Toronto, so skaters were asked to adapt to the different game played on cement. Consisting of AAA and AA ice hockey players from Toronto and Montreal, and coached by Shane Urowitz and Blustein, the team learned the off-ice version of the game on the go.

Toronto girls soccer team won a gold medal at the JCC Macabi Games

"It's a very offensive, puck-possession game," with defencemen acting almost like point guards in basketball, Voihanski said. Ice hockey, on the other hand, relies on aggressive fore-checking, which can backfire in roller hockey when teams counterattack.

Toronto registered a 4-3 record overall, including playoffs. They started with two losses to tournament powerhouses Philadelphia (5-4) and Suffolk (6-4).

As they got used to the game, they rebounded with an 8-0 drubbing of Philadelphia's B team and a 5-4 win over Greater Washington.

In the quarter-final, they defeated Baltimore 6-1. They suffered their second loss to Suffolk in the semifinal, 3-2, in a game that was hotly contested and went down to the wire, Voihanski said.

Relegated to the bronze medal game, they defeated Westchester, N.Y., 4-0.

For their part, the girls under-16 soccer team enjoyed immediate success, racking up a 5-1 record and finishing the round robin as top seed in the 12-team tournament.

They were, however, pressed in the semifinal by Philadelphia – who handed them their only defeat in the round robin – winning a 0-0 game in a shoot-out. Jessie Faber, who Voihanski called the unofficial star of the tournament, scored for Toronto while goalie Hanna Boshari registered the shutout.

Playing Los Angeles in the final, Faber again scored for Toronto, while Boshari shut out the Americans. The local heroes cruised to a 2-0 gold medal victory. Last year's team won a bronze.

The girls' success points to the high calibre of young player in the Toronto area, Voihanski said. Forty girls tried out for the team and coach Menashe Levi had the girls practising together for close to three months, as well as playing other quality teams in exhibitions. Looking ahead to 2012, Voihanski said if everything goes according to plan, the Toronto contingent will include boys' baseball, basketball and soccer teams.

Ultimately, he added, the goal is for Toronto to host a JCC Maccabi Games, something the community hasn't done since 1986.

'Tax issues' prevent Casspi signing with Maccabi Tel Aviv

JTA

TEL AVIV — Omri Casspi won't sign with his former Israeli basketball team during the NBA lockout after all.

A message on Casspi's Twitter page read: "The two sides met today & came to the understanding that the tax issues are too big."

Maccabi Tel Aviv coach David Federman said earlier that Casspi was close to inking a deal with his team. Casspi played with Maccabi Tel Aviv for three seasons before being drafted in 2009 to play for the Sacramento Kings, making him the first Israeli to play in the NBA. Casspi was traded to the Cleveland Cavaliers the day before the start of the July 1 lockout.

ESPN reported that Casspi is considering signing with the French team ASVEL, which is owned by San Antonio Spurs player Tony Parker. Parker has indicated he may play for the team during the lockout. Casspi and Parker also have the same agent.

Casspi, who is currently in Israel, was scheduled to be part of the Israeli national team for the EuroBasket tournament but injured his knee during practice.

He announced on his Twitter page that he would not travel with the Israeli team to Lithuania for its next tournament game. A victory in the European championships could help the Israeli team secure a spot in the 2012 Olympics.

Israeli golfer qualifies for CN Canadian Women's Open

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

"To fly with the best, sometimes you have to leave the nest."

So wrote rock 'n roll legend Randy Bachman in Prairie Town, explaining why he left home for the bright lights of a distant metropolis.

Although she's likely never heard of Bachman, it appears Laetitia Beck subscribes to that same philosophy. She was barely 14 years old when she left her home in Caesarea, Israel, for the golfing Promised Land of west Florida, where she felt she could better pursue her dream of becoming a professional golfer.

"In Israel, it's kind of hard to get better," Beck said on the telephone from Mirabel, Que., where she qualified for the 2011 CN Canadian Women's Open. "If I wanted to improve my game, my family felt I had to go there."

For four years Beck pursued her dream at the IMG Academies' David Leadbetter Golf Academy in Sarasota, Fla., which bills itself as training "the next generation of collegiate and professional stars."

Under the supervision of coach Kevin Collins, Beck improved all aspects of her game. She entered a number of junior tournaments and began to win her share. She finished as runner-up on a number of occasions as well. When she graduated from the academy, she was ranked in the top 5 in the United States in her age group, and her prowess on the links earned her a golf scholarship last year to Duke University in North Carolina.

She'll be resuming her studies this week, but in the meantime, she travelled to Montreal in a bid to qualify for the Women's Open.

Competing along with 42 other hopefuls, Beck shot a one-under 71, good enough for a spot in the LPGA event. She joined a field that included such notables as Lorie Kane, Juli Inkster, Paula Creamer, Michelle Wie and Morgan Pressel.

"It's my first time at a professional tournament," said Beck, 19, although it wasn't her first attempt to qualify for one. Earlier, she had attempted to qualify for the U.S. and British Opens, but was unsuccessful.

"I felt if I keep trying at qualifiers, it will eventually happen," she said.

Beck started well, shooting 71 and 70, good for three under par after two rounds. Things started to unravel over the weekend, however, as she shot rounds of 76 and 77, finishing six over par and well behind tournament winner Brittany Lincicome, who was 13 under.

Still, Beck's performance – she tied for 70th – was the second-best among all amateurs, behind only Canada's Jisoo Keel, who was four over par.

Pressel, meanwhile, who won the Kraft Nabisco Championship in 2007, a major, took home $26,024 with a six under 282, tied at 18th overall.

Speaking in advance of her first round, Beck said her experience in Canada had been gratifying.

Canadians had been very supportive, particularly Jewish fans. "People are happy for me. Everywhere people are surprised that I'm a golfer from Israel."

Considering there is only one 18-hole course in Israel, a recently renovated Pete Dye layout in Caesarea, and another nine-hole course in Kibbutz Gaash, it only stands to reason top-ranked Israeli golfers would be few and far between.

Zohar Sharon, perhaps the best blind golfer in the world, plays the Caesarea course, while 16-year-old Hadas Libman is an up-and-coming talent.

And there's Oren Geri, a 37-year-old from Herzliya who competed in the Golf Channel's Big Break Indian Wells. He was billed as "both the top-ranked amateur and professional golfer from Israel... who has represented his native country in numerous international events, including several World Cup matches."

Laetitia Beck

Beck, of course, is just starting her career, and she believes she still has a lot of work to do before she can become a regular on the tour. She's committed to becoming a professional.

"I like to be the best and work hard," she said. "I'm a perfectionist, so I like to work hard to make my game perfect."

Her own harshest critic, Beck thinks there's room to improve her driving – although at only five-eight-and-a-half and 135 pounds, she can drive the ball 255 yards – but "I don't think I'm hitting it as straight as I should."

So what are her strengths on the course?

"I hit greens in regulation," she said, "and when I miss, it's only a few yards."

Beck was born in Belgium and immigrated to Israel with her family at age six. Her parents are golfers, and they introduced her to the sport when she was nine. By age 12, the Caesarea club pro suggested she compete in the Israeli Open against adults. In her first go, she won the tournament in a playoff against a Swiss player.

Golf suits her temperament, Beck said.

"I like to be by myself a lot. In golf, it's kind of a lonely sport, especially in Israel, because I'm the only girl."

Career at Stratford started with a 'mysterious' phone call

E.B. Smith, right, as Marquess of Dorset in Richard III

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Stratford Festival actor E.B. Smith would love the opportunity to play a Jewish character, but he suspects his looks might hold him back.

"It's been difficult for me because I am of African American decent," he said, adding that while his mother is Jewish, his father was raised Southern Baptist.

"When the opportunity comes up to audition for traditionally Jewish roles, I'm usually not considered because I don't look Jewish," 29-year-old Smith said.

"Some directors are very apt to cast the right person regardless of appearance, but it's a stigma I think you get more from audiences that come in expecting a certain thing, and if they don't get [it], there is something that doesn't ring true for them."

Ironically, Smith, the third actor in a series of three Heebonics features on Jewish performers working at Stratford, said the Jewish tradition of storytelling is what helped flame his passion for theatre acting.

"I take from my Jewish heritage a very strong sense of storytelling and a communal essence of culture and identity... I enjoy the tradition of oral storytelling.

"I feel a very strong tie between that and Shakespeare. Shakespeare's is a very Christian perspective, but I think, at the core of it, the tradition of it is very similar. I think, in that regard, [my Jewish upbringing] has helped me a lot."

Smith, born in Cleveland, Ohio, where he was an active member of Cleveland's Jewish community – he had a bar mitzvah and attended shul every Friday night – said his acting began as a hobby.

"In high school, I was dead set on going into the Naval Academy. One day, I got cast in The Crucible, in another high school around Cleveland. It was an all-girls school, so they needed boys," he recalled.

"That was when I realized that it really kind of fit me."

Following high school, Smith studied acting at Ohio University before moving to Chicago to work for the Chicago Shakespeare Theatre.

Smith said it was a "mysterious" phone call that brought him to Stratford to work as an actor in the world-renowned Shakespeare festival last year.

"The festival actually found me. I was working at the Chicago Shakespeare Theatre, and I got a phone call one day that sounded very mysterious. And the voice said, 'The Stratford Festival would like to see you audition.'

"I hadn't applied, and I hadn't asked for an audition, and it was all very strange. I asked, 'How did you get this number?'

"And she said, 'We have people,'" he recalled, laughing.

A year had passed before Smith got a callback from his audition, and then he was invited last year to become a member of the Birmingham Conservatory for Classical Theatre, a training program at Stratford that prepares young actors for classical theatre work.

About eight actors are chosen for the program, which runs from September to February, and the participants are paid and offered a contract for the festival's following season.

E.B. Smith

In his Stratford debut, having completed his training with the conservatory earlier this year, Smith is currently playing Marquess of Dorset in Richard III, as well as Alarbus in Titus Andronicus. Both plays are running until the end of September.

"I don't think there is any other place in the world like Stratford... The way this place creates theatre is really unique," Smith said.

"The fact that it has four different performance spaces and that it has 12 plays running concurrently – it's rather astonishing. From a logistical point of view and an actor's point of view, the theatre is unsurpassed – it's just immense in that way."

Smith added that the talent of the actors involved with the theatre company is just as impressive.

"The cast in Richard III, I believe, is 20-something people, and they are all pros. And you don't tend to find that depth of talent anywhere else," he said.

"People with walk-on roles have the capability of playing any role in the show. And they are happy to do it because of whom they get to work with and they get to do it here. That makes this place very special."

Smith credited his parents for giving him the freedom to pursue a career in the arts.

"My mother was a musician and a music teacher. And so from a creative aspect, she really understands what I do and why I like to do it.

"My father grew up a jock, and actually had the opportunity to play pro-ball for the Chicago Cubs. He understands it on a different level. He understands the idea of chasing your dreams and working your way up through the ranks."

Smith said both his parents emphasized the idea that people should do what they love – as long as they're good at it and can find a way to make a living doing it.

In addition to doing what he loves, Smith believes the performing arts are important for the overall health of society.

"I think it's really important that we as a society, in the Jewish community and beyond, don't lose the ability to entertain each other. We don't need to turn on a TV to be entertained. I think we have stories within ourselves that we can impart."

"מה כאב לה לתת לי עוד שקית ניירז?" אני רוטנת, בעוד טלי ואני נוחתות על שולחן פנוי, ולוגמות מהמשקאות הקרים שלנו. "קנית שני קרמים וקיבלת כבר שלוש שקיות, מה בער לך לקבל עוד אחת? נשבעת לך, נינה, את אובססיבית." אני מביטה בטלי בכעס. "את אל תדברי על אובססיות. כמה פעמים כבר עשית רי-פיל לקפה המסכן שלך?" טלי מראה לי שבע אצבעות. אני נחרדת. זוג חביב אנחנו, אין מה לדבר. אנו שותקות בהירהור, מביטות על זוג מעורב שמתיישב לצידנו.

אני: נו, היא הרי סיפרה לה בסקייפ שהיא יוצאת עם גוי, כמו שאומרים.

טלי: זה בכל זאת אחרת, ככה שהיא לא יושבת לנו על הווריד. יש פלוסים בזה שההורים שלך לא גרים בקנדה. היאוש יותר קל, אין אפס.

אני: יפה. אז היא לוקחת את זה קל, אני מבינה.

טלי: בהחלט. אמא רק הודיעה לה שהיא מתאבדת לפני שאחותי מתחתנת.

טלי: בדרנית, אה? חכי שהבת שלך תביא לך איזה סיני.

אני: בכלל לא יהיה אכפת לי. להיפך, תדמייני את זה: ליל שבת, הנרות דולקים, אמא של בעלה מגישה אגרולס...

טלי: ושהבן שלך יביא לך נוצרייה? פה כבר אבוד לך עם נכדים יהודים, יו-נואו.

אני: הבן שלי אוהב אותן יהודיות, אל תדאגי לו. הוא נמשך בלעדית לביצ'יות...

טלי: מזל שיש לי רק בנות. בחיים לא הייתי מסתדרת עם אשתו של הבן שלי.

אני: אוי, את רואה את ההוא בשולחן השמאלי? הוא מהטלוויזיה!!!

טלי: מי? מי?! אוי נכון! זה מהתכנית העיצוב: קח את הבית הזה ודחוף אותו, או משהו כזה. וואו. איזה נמוך הוא בחיים.

אני: לא, מהתכנית בישול, לא? מה, הם שמים לו שם עדשות מגע כחולות?

טלי: לא ידעתי שהוא יהודי בכלל. איזו התרגשות!

טלי: נו, איפה אנחנו יושבות? חוץ מזה, תראי איזה אבא מסור הוא. משלנו.

אני: אבל הוא רווק ניצחי. אין לו ילדים. קראתי. בטח בן אחותו, או משהו.

טלי: איזה קטע. אני חייבת להתקשר לאחותי לספר לה שאנחנו יושבות פה עם סלב אמיתי. היא מתה על התכנית עיצוב הזו.

אני: תכנית אוכל, לא? הוא לא מגיש עם השף השני, או משהו?

טלי: את יודעת מה, אולי זה בכלל לא הוא?

אני: זה לא הוא. זה סתם איש שיושב לאכול עם הבן שלו.

טלי: עובדה, אף אחד לא מבקש חתימות. מצד שני, זה קנדה פה, לאנשים יש סטייל, דיגניטי. זה לא קניון נתניה. קצת כבוד.

אני: טלי, גם את מתגעגעת קצת לקניון רמת אביב?

Friends of Yiddish group celebrates 30 years

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Thirty years ago, Gloria Morris and a small group of friends met for a "Yiddish" lunch.

They got such pleasure out of conversing together in Yiddish, she said, that they thought plenty of others would also be interested.

They held a meeting, elected an executive – Hindy Abelson was the first president – and officially started Friends of Yiddish, an organization whose purpose is to help ensure the continuity and growth of Yiddish language, literature and culture.

With about 160 members, FOY runs monthly meetings and holds programs for members and the public.

As well, they organize Yiddish conversation groups, publish a newsletter, and occasionally offer trips to places of major Yiddish interest.

Morris, a first-generation Canadian, said that growing up, her grandmother spoke no English, "so we spoke in Yiddish. I have a very warm feeling [for the language]."

Helen Smolkin, a French teacher, is on the board of the International Association of Yiddish Clubs and has been president of FOY since last year. She was co-president of FOY for five years with Eda Zimler, who was also president for a number of years.

Smolkin has had a passion for Yiddish since growing up speaking Yiddish to her parents.

"Now my husband understands how I feel and loves Yiddish as well. There is no other language like it," said Smolkin, who runs a Yiddish kiddush at Beit Rayim Synagogue.

"Yiddish is not dying. Young people are still studying it, and we are trying to promote it from generation to generation."

She said her son, Mitch, the recipient of a FOY scholarship to study in the Uriel Weinreich Program in Yiddish Language, Literature and Culture at Columbia University, is a Yiddish entertainer "and is helping to continue the legacy. This program is now offered at other centres, and FOY takes applicants for scholarships."

Smolkin said FOY, which is funded by dues, has no website, and it depends on word of mouth.

"We sent an outreach letter to a woman whose membership had lapsed, and we asked her to rejoin. She was so touched by the letter that she took out a membership in memory of her husband. It's giving her a lot of pleasure now.

"That is how we work. We are the ambassadors."

Friends of Yiddish is launching its new season with a breakfast featuring comic Alf Kwinter, who will perform in English with some Yiddish, Sept. 11 at Beth Tikvah Synagogue. For information, e-mail yiddish18@yahoo.ca.

Campus radio group passes BDS motion

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The National Campus and Community Radio Association (NCRA) quietly adopted a motion in June at its annual general meeting to endorse the boycott, divestment and sanctions campaign against Israel and its media institutions.

The motion, which accuses Israel of "waves of ethnic cleansing" and of enforcing a system that "resembles the defunct apartheid system in South Africa," passed when a majority of about 100 delegates representing 23 member stations voted in favour of the boycott.

Many NCRA stations are on university and college campuses and are supported in part by student fees.

Aaron Lakoff, a volunteer news and music programmer at McGill University's CKUT and a Jewish, anti-Zionist activist in Montreal, was one of the members who put the motion forward.

Lakoff said the motion, modelled on a similar one passed by the World Association of Community Radio Broadcasters in Argentina in November, called on NCRA members to "comprehensively and consistently boycott all Israeli media institutions and products... refrain from participation in any form of co-operation, collaboration or joint projects with Israeli media institutions... [and] advocate a comprehensive boycott of Israeli media institutions at the national and international levels."

Lakoff, who said his station has often presented pro-Palestinian programming and backed events "relating to the Israeli occupation and the Palestinian freedom struggles," said the motion was carefully worded to affirm support for the creation of community radio stations in Israel and to challenge "institutional censorship" policies enforced by the Israeli government.

Kenney To Speak

OTTAWA — Federal Immigration Minister Jason Kenney will speak at the "anti-Durban" conference being held Sept. 22 in New York City. Kenney will join such prominent speakers as Nobel Prize-winner Elie Wiesel, Harvard Law professor Alan Dershowitz and actor Jon Voigt at the event, which will run at the same time as a UN anti-racism conference in the city that Canada, Israel, the United States and others are boycotting because they say it will become an Israel-bashing forum like its predecessors in 2001 and 2009. The Sept. 22 event will mark 10 years since the first conference, held in Durban, South Africa, in 2001. Canada was the first nation to say it would not take part in this year's UN conference.

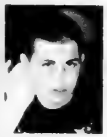
Concert Interrupted

LONDON — Anti-Israel protesters disrupted a live BBC broadcast of the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra playing in London. Hecklers in the audience shouted during its Sept. 1 appearance at London's Royal Albert Hall. BBC's Radio 3 interrupted its broadcast and later resumed it, only to suspend it after more shouting. The orchestra was taking part in the BBC Proms summer classical music festival. The hecklers were removed by security and jeered by the audience. The Palestine Solidarity Campaign had called for a boycott of the concert. The BBC refused calls to cancel the performance, saying the orchestra's invitation to perform was "purely musical."

Monument Defaced

WARSAW — Vandals defaced a monument in the eastern Polish town of Jedwabne that recalls hundreds of Jews burned alive in a barn there by their Polish neighbours in July 1941. A decade ago, a book about the massacre, Neighbours, prompted a national debate on Poland's role in the Shoah. In last week's attack, antisemitic slogans and swastikas were scrawled in big green letters on the monument and the wall around it. One read, "No need to apologize for Jedwabne." The monument isn't lit and stands on its own, away from town buildings. Police are linking this attack to other apparent neo-fascist attacks aimed at minorities in the past few weeks in eastern and northeast Poland, including antisemitic slogans and Nazi symbols found on the former synagogue in the town of Orla on Aug. 10.

U.S. Muslims Urge Hamas To Free Schalit



Gilad Schalit

LONDON — A group of prominent American Muslims issued a letter Aug. 26 urging Hamas to immediately release captive Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit.

The letter's 11 signatories include the two Muslim members of the U.S. Congress – Reps. Keith Ellison (D-Minn.) and Andre Carson (D-Ind.) – as well as Muslim academics and communal figures.

"We believe Hamas' harsh treatment and five-year detention of Schalit is wrong," the Muslim leaders wrote in their letter, which was addressed to Khaled Meshal, the Syrian-based chairman of Hamas' political bureau.

The letter noted that Hamas has complained about the conditions under which Israel holds thousands of Palestinian prisoners. Citing the teachings of Muhammad, the letter's signatories wrote that Muslims are "instructed to 'repel the evil deed with one that is better.'"

"The struggle for Palestinian human rights and self-determination must be based on this ethical and moral code," the letter said. "Hamas' inhumane detention of Schalit undermines the Palestinian people's legitimate aspirations for human rights and a state of their own, existing in peace and security beside Israel."

Day school tuition fees on the rise...again

Cost of education increases more than rate of inflation

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Rising Jewish day school tuition costs are hitting the middle class hardest, and educators and community leaders are not offering much hope that the situation will change soon.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto provides about $10 million – more than any other Jewish federation – according to Elizabeth Wolfe, chair of federation's board of directors – to subsidize costs for families who cannot afford full tuition.

Federation subsidies enable access for lower income families, but don't provide broad-based tuition help, Wolfe said. "It's not something we have been able to accomplish. If you know somebody who wants to commit a billion dollars to an education endowment, that would go a long way."

"It's not realistic to assume that UJA's fundraising capacity can fulfil [the need to lower tuition across the board]," Wolfe told The CJN.

The Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto likely has the highest Jewish day school rates in the city, at $21,500 for the 2011/2012 school year. The cost represents an increase of seven per cent over last year, when tuition was $20,100.

"The cost of providing education at all levels, whether public or private, consistently rises faster than the rate of inflation [reported by Statistics Canada as 3.1 per cent in June of this year]," said Paul Shaviv, TanenbaumCHAT's director of education.

At TanenbaumCHAT, total enrolment is down slightly from more than 1,400 students last year to just under 1,400 this year, reflecting "demographic trends in the community," Shaviv said. "We are past the baby boom peak... The Toronto District School Board is closing many schools."

From another perspective, the school's retention rate for the coming year – more than 94 per cent – is record-setting, according to Shaviv. "We are delighted about that."

But, he said, he can't "persuade parents to have more babies 15 years ago." He noted that the percentage of students entering Grade 9 from TanenbaumCHAT's feeder schools [local Jewish day schools] "has not materially changed over the last few years."

The Benjamin Foundation
Through the generations ...a sacred trust

HONOURING LIVES LIVED

"Our wonderful life-affirming tradition turns loss into constructive remembrance that helps heal the world."

Shelley Norris, Executive Director, The Benjamin Foundation

The Benjamin Foundation allows families to entrust memorial donations for temporary management until they are ready to select a charity that meaningfully honours the deceased. This takes the pressure of making a long-term decision off grieving families and also makes it easy for mourners to contribute.

Israel's realist think-tank (2)

The Begin-Sadat (BESA) Center for Strategic Studies at Bar-Ilan University in Israel is renowned around the world for its straight-talking approach to Middle East geo-political policy analysis. It is also renowned for its clear ideological orientation. It openly advances "a realist, conservative and staunchly Zionist agenda in the search for peace for Israel."

Anyone examining the long inventory of the centre's publications will be struck by the substantively comprehensive and earnest nature of the many works, as well as by the wide diversity of opinions expressed in those works.

From the editor's desk...

For example, the centre recently published a position paper by Maj.-Gen. (res.) Giora Eiland in which he questioned the conventional two-state solution that is now the accepted paradigm for resolving the Palestinian-Israel conflict. Eiland has become increasingly despairing of the possibility of arriving at a negotiated, two-state solution with the Palestinian Authority leadership. He thus called for a new international initiative to supplant the current stalemate. He suggested a novel two-pronged approach to ending the conflict: a Jordanian-Palestinian federation combined with land swaps involving portions of the Egyptian Sinai desert.

Some months later, presumably after undoubtedly intense internal discussion and debate regarding Eiland's proposal, the centre published a position paper by one of its associates, Prof. Stuart Cohen, who suggested an alternative to the Eiland alternative: a unilateral Israeli dismantlement of the civilian settlements established since 1967 in Judea and Samaria.

In light of the centre's stated "realist, conservative and staunchly Zionist agenda," it was surprising to see Cohen's suggestion also published under the centre's imprimatur.

There are many more such examples of the BESA Center publishing contrary and even quite opposing points of view in its various discussion papers. And in this approach by BESA in "the search for peace for Israel," there is a lesson for us, for all communities concerning the tolerance we should extend to others, if not necessarily for their opinions.

BESA invites and encourages wide discussion – within parameters, of course, that do not offend its core mission – on the entire range of issues that affect the peace and security of the Jewish state. In this sincere exchange of ideas, BESA scholars and strategists believe the centre's core principles ultimately emerge strengthened. Free debate is the intellectual foundry in which key beliefs are tested and refined. The publication of counter-argument enhances the reputation of the centre's integrity and thus enables it to better advance its "realist" mission through policies and ideas that can withstand counter-argument.

In this regard, it is noteworthy that Routledge: Taylor & Francis Group of London and New York recently published Israeli Statecraft: National Security Challenges and Responses, by Yehezkel Dror, for BESA Studies in International Security.

Dror is one of Israel's most venerated policy thinkers. He is professor of political science and public administration, emeritus, at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, with a long list of publications, academic associations and peer group distinctions.

He is an experienced observer of the world and of the many competing, often dysfunctional systems of government within it. He is also an experienced participant in helping formulate public policy that tries to mend the dysfunctions.

His signature is looking long and with great acuity into the far horizon of tomorrow. Where most of us see mostly a hazy uncertainty, Dror always sees the outlines and shapes of possibilities.

In the BESA series book, Dror brings his rich background in analysis to examine Israeli statecraft in the face of specific current national security challenges. It is a multi-layered work that cuts across disciplines and interrelates ideas with the complicated detail and intermeshing precision of a Frank Gehry-designed concert hall.

Dror provides detailed recommendations along with the comprehensive contextual background. Some of the recommendations are stunning in their originality. He offers suggestions in relation to the wide range of difficult situations facing the Jewish state, including the broad Arab-Israeli conflict, the narrower conflict with the Palestinians, the threat posed by Iran, Israel's relations with the Diaspora, Israel's relations with the United States, Israel's relations with the international community and much more.

Not all of Dror's suggestions can be said to strictly conform to the "realist, conservative" approach that is the BESA Center's hallmark. That BESA has published Dror's ideas is a lesson to us all about how to look for solutions to the pressing, multifaceted, existential problem that we call the search for peace for Israel.

Med student takes part in Uganda mission

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Second-year University of Toronto medical student Jordan Silverman said he feels lucky to have been involved with a humanitarian mission that provided necessary spinal surgery to people in Uganda, donated school supplies for 200 children, and presented the Abayudaya Tribe – the Ugandan Jewish community – with their first authentic Torah.

Ve'ahavta, the Toronto-based humanitarian organization, partnered with the Uganda Charitable Spine Surgery Mission (UCSSM) last month for a medical mission that helped 17 patients who suffered from spinal issues such as scoliosis, spinal deformities caused by tuberculosis, degenerative disc disease and spinal cord injuries.

In addition to the free surgeries provided by a team of 13 surgeons and health professionals, Ve'ahavta also sent more than $160,000 in medical supplies for patients in the Mulago Hospital in Kampala, as well as 200 "kinder kits" – knapsacks filled with school supplies.

"The 200 kinder kits were given out in two parts. About 50 were given to children we saw in the clinic, whether or not we were performing surgery on them… The other 150 were given to the children of Putti, where the… Jewish community lives," Silverman said.

Jordan Silverman hands out kinder kits to Ugandan children.

The kits included notebooks, pens, pencils, a sharpener, as well as a Shabbat candle and a dreidel.

"At the clinic, throughout the week, you would see the kids walking around with their knapsacks, and every time I walked by, they would smile, because they remembered, 'You're the guy that gave me this beautiful gift.'"

But Silverman, who joined the mission to represent Ve'ahavta, said the most moving part of the mission was the donation of a Torah to the Jewish community in the village of Putti.

Last year, Dr. Isador Lieberman, an orthopedic surgeon from Texas who had just completed his sixth medical mission with the UCSSM, learned about the Abayudaya community, ethnic Jews who observe Shabbat and keep kosher, but did not own a Torah.

"They had been struggling for recognition among Orthodox Jews in the world that they are Jewish," Silverman said. "They converted into Judaism… but they have been following Jewish practice for about 100 years, and it has been frustrating for them not to have the support of the Jewish communities around the world."

Inspired by their devotion to the Jewish faith, Lieberman promised the congregation – estimated at about 1,100 people – that he would bring them an authentic Torah.

A World War-II-era Torah scroll was purchased in part by Ve'ahavta, as well as donors from the Jewish community in Texas, Silverman said.

"It was very emotional. People were crying. The members that were receiving it were crying. The people who were presenting it were crying."

Adhering to the custom traditionally followed when bringing a Torah into a synagogue, Silverman said a makeshift chupah was constructed out of a bed sheet and four sticks that were found on the ground.

"We marched around with the Torah. There were about 150 people dancing around, singing, as we marched the Torah to the synagogue where it was placed in the Aron Kodesh," Silverman recalled.

"For people who had been struggling for so long to be recognized as Jewish, it made me truly appreciate the value of being Jewish. They were so happy… I think getting the Torah was really a validating process."

Of course, the main purpose of the mission was to provide life-changing spinal surgery for a population that suffers from a disproportionate number of deformities.

Silverman said his role on the team was to work closely with Lieberman as a scribe.

"He and I would see patients in the clinic, and I was to write up their cases, collect their information and document the clinical encounter and any follow-up that there was for the 40 or 50 patients that we saw," he said.

"There was a lot to learn both in the clinic and in the operating room. I got to scrub in on a few surgeries… They would teach me suturing and how to hold the suction [tube]."

Silverman said that although he learned a lot from a medical standpoint, the emotional impact the mission had on him was even more significant.

"This was mainly a medical trip, but giving out the kinder kits and the Torah were just as rewarding, if not more rewarding, than the medical part."

Everything changed on that terrible Tuesday morning 10 years ago, on Sept. 11, 2001. Nearly 3,000 people were killed by 19 Al Qaeda terrorists. The lives of the families and friends of the individuals murdered were forever altered and disfigured, diminished for all time. Our society faced the newly activated, brazen hatred of a radical, despotic Islamism entirely opposed to the values of the free and liberal West.

And nothing changed on that day. For we still confront that hatred. The chief planner of the attacks 10 years ago has been dispatched. But the cause around which he rallied his fellow murderers remains, embraced by countless exploited youths and even some thuggish theocrats who rule Iran, Hezbollah and Hamas, for example.

The further proof of the perseverance of that unvanquished, unabated hatred lies in an irony too disgustingly surreal to ignore: the United Nations has chosen to commemorate the 10th anniversary of the anti-Israel, antisemitic hate fest known as the Durban I conference on the very day of the 10th anniversary of 9-11 atrocities. The Durban I conference, it should be recalled, ended three days before 9-11. It was the perverse prologue to the ghoulish Twin Tower inferno.

"What must we – each one of us – do now?" The CJN asked on this page after 9-11. The question is as urgent today as it was then, as is, too, the answer that was written then on this page.

"Perhaps we might find our inspiration in the actions of the firefighters and police, the men and women who risked their lives last week in order to save other lives. As people were running away from the unfolding massive terror, the firefighters and police were actually running toward it, to rescue, to comfort, to aid.

"When questioned late last week, one firefighter, having worked through the chilly, wet night, still desperately seeking any stirrings of human life in the death-drenched debris, explained his determination. 'My mind was set… that we would not give up…'

"Like the firefighters, we, each one of us, must never give up being sentinels and sentries for the values we so deeply cherish. Like the firefighters, we, too… have duties; namely, each day to be exemplars of those values.

"Whatever challenges and difficulties lie ahead, as our society confronts the people who planned and perpetrated the terror last week, we, like the firefighters, must remain individuals of courage and compassion, of goodness and decency, a testament to the excellence and indomitability of democratic ideals and the democratic way of life."

With reverence for the murdered, we look back on that horrible Tuesday 10 years ago. And with resolve, we say that it must never happen again. We choose to affirm the sanctity of life.

25 years ago in The CJN

A machine gun and grenade attack by two Arab terrorists on the Neve Shalom synagogue in Istanbul killed 22 Shabbat morning worshippers and wounded four more. Israeli prime minister Shimon Peres called it the bloodiest shul massacre since the Nazi era.

Community 'unbranded'

I am saddened for the Canadian Jewish community, which has been "unbranded" by the new organization called the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA). Where is the "Canadian" in it ("Congress era over as CIJA reboot starts," Aug. 25)? How is it going to look when this new advocacy organization is quoted in the general media? Will the broader, non-Jewish Canadian community know what CIJA is and what relationship it has to the Canadian Jewish community? It could be any organization from anywhere, and the new name sounds more about dealing with Israel affairs than about domestic Jewish affairs in Canada, such as antisemitism, which affects the average Jewish Canadian directly. Or maybe that is the point. As Sally Zerker implies in "The restructuring of communal advocacy" (Aug. 25), perhaps CIJA wants to be one step removed from its grassroots. It seems to me that we had a perfect brand already – Canadian Jewish Congress – which as a grassroots organization spelled out exactly what the Jewish community stood for and what it sought to achieve through its advocacy.

University homecoming during holidays

The University of Western Ontario has a long history of championing freedom of academic thought and expression, and inclusion of people from all ethnic, religious and cultural backgrounds. Regrettably, when we set the 2011 Homecoming dates some years ago for Sept. 30 and Oct. 2, we missed the overlap with Rosh Hashanah. As a result, many of our Jewish students, alumni, faculty and staff will not be able to participate in parts of Homecoming. We regret this oversight, and commit that when planning future major public events, we will take greater care to avoid this type of conflict.

New JCC while school fees high

I, too, mourn with my friend Rabbi Erwin Schild ("On Tisha b'Av weep for the BJCC, Aug. 4). There are survival needs for the Jewish People. Many families are unable to afford the tuition required for Jewish schooling for their children, and some in fact suffer impoverishment in paying the high fees required to maintain our religious educational institutions. Israel is being threatened and we are using funds for a fancier Jewish community centre?

San Remo resolution still binding

Bernard Katz ("The British Mandate," letters, Sept 1) is wrong when he states that "the West Bank was never recognized under the British Mandate as part of a future Jewish state." But the San Remo conference of the League of Nations in 1920 issued a resolution "in favour of the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people." The resolution makes no distinction between the different parts of "Palestine" and most certainly did not exclude the West Bank (a term that only came into use much later), either explicitly or implicitly. What's more, the San Remo resolution is still binding under international law, as the United Nations has not abrogated it or changed its terms.

Palestinian 'aspirations'

One can only empathize with letter writer Toby Brooks ("Land confiscated in West Bank," Sept. 1), who has nightmares of the "expropriation of Canada's magnificent wilderness by New York State" as she likens it to Israel's right to Kiryat Hayovel, which was originally uncultivated land in southwestern Jerusalem located on Mount Herzl. Kiryat Hayovel was built in the 1950s to house thousands of Jews who fled their homes in Arab countries. It also happened to be the residence of Teddy Kollek, a former mayor of Jerusalem. We do not know if she sleeps soundly when attackers from Gaza, an area where Israel dismantled settlements and that it vacated, commit murder and mayhem on innocent Israelis. She concludes with a wish that Israel desist from "delegitimizing" itself so that she can speak up for an Israel that respects the "aspirations" of its Palestinian neighbours. If the aspirations of these Palestinian neighbours are reflected in the Hamas charter, with its goal to drive the Jews into the sea, then Brooks must realize that Israel does not intend to respect such aspirations.

No time to lose confronting many pressing problems

By Shimon Fogel

As we launch the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, the new advocacy body representing Canadian Jewry, our community is in a unique position.

We enjoy equal rights, full participation in Canadian society, and complete freedom to practice our faith and traditions without fear – indeed, often with the full support of our neighbours. The recent incident at Beth Tikvah Synagogue in Toronto is especially telling, but not because of the appearance of the antisemitic graffiti itself. Rather, the heartfelt response of the shul's non-Jewish neighbours, including those companies that offered to remove the graffiti free of charge, should give us all pause to reflect on the fortunate position we enjoy as Canadian Jews in 2011, an exception to most of our people's history.

In the midst of these blessings, we stand before a number of escalating and quickly evolving challenges. Antisemitism is of course unacceptable in Canada, but at the same time anti-Zionism has become increasingly fashionable. Whether on campus, within the trade union movement or inside some churches, the questioning of Israel's very right to exist – far beyond any reasonable criticism of Israeli policies – has gained momentum. Although we have many non-Jewish friends who see this trend for what it is, it has flown under the radar for far too many others.

Shimon Fogel

The blurring of the line between antisemitism and anti-Zionism resulted in overlapping mandates between previous advocacy organizations. Take the example of Israeli Apartheid Week. When Jewish students are intimidated on campus during anti-Zionist demonstrations, is this an Israel advocacy issue, or a matter of domestic security and antisemitism? The answer, of course, is both. Our community has long perceived its own security, as Canadian Jews, in response to the level of hostility projected upon Israel – and with good reason.

If we are ever unable to openly show support or affection for the Jewish national homeland and its residents, we will have found ourselves unable to give expression to our very sense of Judaism and Jewish life. In western Europe in the 19th century, our ancestors were told they could be Jews privately but not publicly. Today, our community's detractors are attempting to create a situation where we are free to be Jews both publicly and privately – but Zionists never. We cannot allow this to happen, and this is just one compelling reason for a united organization that operates through a single lens and under a central, strategic direction.

That said, worries are not all that lie ahead. The greatest challenges often come in the form of opportunities that compel us to the high standards of those who came before us. Today, our community stands at the crossroads of a number of key public policy debates. How can Canada best offer both reasonable accommodation and values-based integration for immigrants? How can we ensure, in increasingly unstable economic times, that every Canadian gets his or her opportunity to prosper and that the most vulnerable are not left behind?

Although we continue to see Jewish immigration to Canada, we are no longer a community of immigrants. Our story has a special place in the development and greater history of our country. Our parents and grandparents made an immense contribution not only to civic society as a whole, but to the laws, policies, and principles that governed Canada – to the betterment of all Canadians.

It is with reverence for our past and with a focus on the new opportunities and challenges ahead that the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs takes up the mantle of community advocacy following a restructuring process that engaged stakeholders from across the country.

Through this process, we have discerned the best practices of our predecessor organizations, including the Canadian Jewish Congress and the Canada-Israel Committee, and forged a path that will enable us to uphold the legacy, achievements, and traditions of these distinguished organizations.

One of those best practices is the need to enshrine grassroots empowerment as a definitive operating principle, shaping our entire advocacy model and strategic objectives. This is why the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs has been structured to ensure local engagement and accountability to every community – big and small – on a level never before experienced.

Jewish federations will remain the focal point for Canadian Jewry to get involved and make a difference. Local leaders in both federated and non-federated locations will be on the forefront of developing and delivering the agenda, with the support, expertise, and collaboration of our national team. It is with pride that we note that, with an estimated 100,000 donors nationwide through our federation partners, we have established the most representative community body in the country.

There has been criticism levelled at the new organization from some in our community. Those that have been shared directly with our lay leaders and staff and offered for constructive purposes have been extremely useful. These points will enable us to move forward with even greater effectiveness and accountability.

However, some criticisms are not constructive, and indeed are perhaps not intended to be so. Simply put, we cannot allow ourselves to be distracted by those who wish to air internal community disputes in the media and greater public forums.

We have too much urgent work to do not just in the future, but right now - and on a full range of issues, both domestic and international.

The president of Iran denies the Shoah, threatens to wipe Israel off the map, and sends heavy weapons to Hezbollah and Hamas while developing Iran's own illegal nuclear program. Young Jews bear witness to the slandering of Israel on campus, both in and out of the classroom. Poverty among elderly Jews in Canada continues to be a serious concern, with some 16 per cent of those over the age of 75 living under the poverty line.

These are just a few of many pressing problems our community faces. Frankly, we have no time to lose. Together with our federation partners, we need to map out solutions and work with governments, at the federal, provincial, and municipal levels. We need to build coalitions with like-minded Canadians across the country. And we must develop creative policy approaches that ensure we achieve the greatest impact possible.

As a community, we have an opportunity to position Canada as a leader on all of these issues – especially the cornerstones of human rights, social justice, and the defence of Israel, all pillars of our predecessor organizations.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs' board of directors is an impressive and diverse roster of lay leaders from across the country. It consists of people from larger and smaller communities alike, stemming from a variety of professional backgrounds – including former parliamentarians from across the political spectrum. And as the official representative of Canada's pro-Israel community, I am proud to say that the organization's lay leadership also includes a number of prominent non-Jews who are as committed as they are knowledgeable.

Our organization includes a professional staff of more than 40 outstanding individuals, representing a substantial depth of experience across a range of fields. Based in offices in Ottawa, Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, and Vancouver, and with experience in corporate and non-profit leadership roles, as well as in Jewish community work, government, media and public opinion research, they are devoted to fulfilling our mandate with vigour and innovation.

Canada's Jews, like Jews everywhere, have always been visionaries, demanding of themselves hard work, integrity, and excellence. This is what inspires the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, as we begin a new chapter in Canadian Jewish life.

We recognize that the stakes are high. We have been tasked with ensuring that Canada remains a place where our children and grandchildren will always be free to be fully Jewish and fully Canadian – and contribute to building an even better country for all its citizens.

None of us would be here today if not for the sacrifices of those who came before us. I intend for Canadian Jewry in the next century to be able to make the same claim of our generation with authenticity. That's why the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs will succeed in its vision – and settle for nothing less.

Teaching for the future

As I write this, sitting in a café in late Jerusalem summer, a hurricane rages up the Atlantic coast. CNN covers it non-stop. That's how it is: round-the-clock media feed a growing appetite for the fearsome, disturbing and bad. Meanwhile, the good – whether balmy weather or acts of human kindness – goes uncovered. As we approach Rosh Hashanah, I want to focus on a spot of good.

For the past 10 years, my York University colleagues Michael Brown and Mark Webber have developed and nurtured a unique program for the study of the Holocaust. The Mark and Gail Appel Program in Holocaust and Antiracism Education – Teaching from the Past, Teaching for the Future – brings together Canadian, German and Polish students to contend with the Jewish past and its implications.

Affectionately known by its partipants as "TftF," this initiative of York's Israel and Golda Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies and the Canadian Centre for German and European Studies teaches by travelling through Poland and Germany, visiting places of Jewish life and Jewish death, meeting eyewitnesses and local educators and museum curators committed to commemorating the past and drawing lessons from it.

Participants learn about Judaism by visiting synagogues and community centres. During the winter following their summer study, they convene again in Canada for a week's seminar, listening to professors and survivors, presenting their own research and pedagogical projects, and exploring the multicultural society of Canada. Most participants intend to teach at the elementary and high school levels. A few plan to become professors or work at memorial museums.

In addition to the formidable challenge of studying the Holocaust intensely for an extended period of time, participants learn to speak with one another across cultural divides, addressing preconceptions about one another and differing interpretations of the past. They learn – as Webber notes – that we can disagree respectfully and remain friends.

This summer, marking the 10-year anniversary of TftF, alumni of past programs travelled together to Israel. By now well-launched into their own careers – as teachers, professors, journalists, museum workers – they reported on the impact of TftF on their sense of purpose. Now, they have come to Israel, to study not simply the Jewish past, but its present and future.

Now, the final day of our time together here, we reflect on what, for most, is a first encounter with this country. They come to it with great curiosity and many questions, and a range of political views. Immersing in the actuality of Israel compels them to deepen and sometimes to reconsider what they think they know.

In workshops at Yad Vashem and at Kibbutz Lochamei Ha-Geta'ot, we focus on what the Holocaust means to contemporary Israel. Participants of different religious traditions enjoy the Shabbat hospitality of Jerusalem families. Working with the Melton Centre at Hebrew University, we visit orphanages and absorptions centres, synagogues and mosques, Arab villages and institutes for Israel-Arab understanding. We encounter the diversity that is Israel, meeting religious and secular Israelis; recent Ethiopian and Russian immigrants; urban dwellers, and kibbutz members. We run into the social protesters who have set up tents along Rothschild Boulevard in Tel Aviv. We see a theatrical performance by a blind and deaf troupe.

We travel with Israeli educators and guides who talk to us about their own lives. We discuss family life in Israel, the education system, the ethos of the Israel Defence Forces, and Israeli social structures and human rights. We even argue politics.

And as I sit over coffee in the waning afternoon light of Jerusalem, where our journey in Israel begins and ends, I reflect on our experiences together. These thoughtful, bright and idealistic young people, once our students and now our colleagues, will take with them variegated impressions of a complex and vital country, and new relationships, in a process that's only beginning.

A Muslim-Canadian teacher, for example, plans to set up Web encounters between her Toronto students and the classes of an Ethiopian-Israeli teacher she met. A Canadian student understands why the term Israeli apartheid is slanderous. Polish and German teachers share pedagogic strategies for bringing the Jewish experience to their students.

Like many other campuses, mine has its share of contentiousness, especially regarding the Middle East. Like hurricanes, this captures the attention of the media. But my campus is also home to fine projects such as TftF, a part of tikkun olam.

You can't love Jews if you hate Judaism

The theology of many evangelicals and the politics of the current government of Israel seem to converge. Perhaps that's what was behind Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's remark when he addressed the sixth annual conference of the intensely pro-Israel group Christians United for Israel (CUFI) in Washington D.C., in July: "Our enemies think that we are you, and that you are us. And you know something? They are absolutely right."

Speakers included not only Michael Oren, Israel's ambassador to the United States, but also Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations, the most representative body of American Jewry. His presence may be indicative of the support of many of his constituents.

Rabbi Dow Marmur

in Toronto

The ubiquitous Rabbi Shmuely Boteach was also there. His blog described it as an unforgettable experience: "Until you sit in a room with 5,000 Christian lovers of Israel and absorb their enthusiasm for the Jewish state and the Jewish people, you would be hard-pressed to think it possible."

This rabbi doesn't seem to be troubled by the motivation of those who want to bring all Jews to their homeland to prepare them to embrace Jesus when he comes to redeem the world. Although even the most ardent Zionists have given up the hope of moving the entire Jewish Diaspora to Israel, these evangelicals have not. And Jews on the political right are mistakenly impressed by the determination to help make it happen.

The stance of CUFI also accounts for its opposition to the creation of a Palestinian state. In the understanding of many evangelicals, the Bible brings conclusive evidence that all the Land of Israel that God gave to the Jewish people must remain in Jewish hands. That's why they support settlement expansion and refuse to consider the partition of Jerusalem. They also advocate attacking Iran as a way of bringing about Armageddon.

All this is music to the ears of many cynical Jews. Even those without ideological baggage often argue naively that Israel cannot afford to alienate friends, whatever their theological agenda. The more than 700,000 members of CUFI are ardent advocates of the cause of the Jewish state. They hold sway over many members of the U.S. Congress. Behind them are millions of other evangelicals, including Republican presidential hopefuls, whose influence on American politics is enormous.

But Rabbi Boteach goes further. Whereas cynics see close relations between Jews and evangelicals as a marriage of convenience, Rabbi Boteach is looking for common religious ground between Christianity and Judaism. The author of the popular Kosher Sex is about to publish a book with the provocative title Kosher Jesus, in which he argues that Jesus was "a wholly observant, Pharisaic rabbi who fought Roman paganism and oppression and was killed for it."

Rabbi Boteach will assert that "Jesus never claimed divinity and not only did not abrogate the Torah, but observed every letter of the law." Serious scholars of rabbinic Judaism and early Christianity draw a much more nuanced and accurate picture, but this populist has worked it all out with simplistic certainty.

Though Rabbi Boteach tells us that many Christians may be confused by his assertions, it's reasonable to assume that his views will sit well with the members of CUFI in their effort to show that it's prudent and expedient for Jews to embrace Jesus in order to facilitate his second coming. Perhaps that's also why the organization's executive director, David Brog, is a Jew: a relative of none other than Israel's defence minister, Ehud Barak.

As a Zionist, I'm prepared to honour and praise every supporter of Israel. As a Jew, I've always been engaged in and enthusiastically promoted Christian-Jewish co-operation, not because the two religions are the same – they are not – but because, in our secular world, they face common challenges and, therefore, need each other.

But I'm appalled at the cynical and naive ways in which Jews celebrate Christians whose great hope is to see the end of Judaism as a necessary condition for the vindication of their faith in Jesus. As tolerant members of society we've no right to seek to restrict the theology of others, but we must distance ourselves from every attempt, overt or covert, to invalidate our own tradition.

As much as we welcome much-needed support for Israel, we must remember that you cannot love Jews if you hate Judaism.

Gadhafi turned Libya into a pariah state

Eight months after a frustrated Tunisian food vendor named Mohammed Bouazizi set himself on fire, touching off popular rebellions in the Arab world that unseated the authoritarian presidents of Tunisia and Egypt, swept into Bahrain and Yemen and now threatens to inundate the dictatorship of Bashar Assad of Syria, the tides of change have crashed into Libya.

Two weeks ago, in what promises to be the denouement of a six-month civil war, Libyan rebels, supported by western air strikes, seized control of Tripoli, Libya's capital, and declared victory over Moammar Gadhafi, the theatrical, iron-fisted ruler of Libya who held Libya in thrall for nearly 42 years and cultivated a Stalin-like cult of personality.

Given to flowing robes, Gadhafi, the bizarre bad boy of the Middle East since his accession to power in a bloodless coup on Sept. 1 1969, will likely fight to the bitter end, having promised to "martyr" himself rather than surrender abjectly to his enemies. But as U.S. President Barack Obama has observed, Gadhafi's days are numbered. The Gadhafi era, which plunged Libya into international isolation and turned it into a pariah state, has effectively run its course.

Sought by the International Criminal Court for ordering attacks against civilians, he remains in hiding, a hunted fugitive who seemed at the top of his game only last winter. "This is my country," he declared in a characteristically fiery speech on Feb. 17 when the revolt in Libya erupted, six days after Egypt's president, Hosni Mubarak, was forced to resign.

As protests widened, enveloping Libya in conflagration, Gadhafi claimed that the Libyan people were behind him. "They love me all," he claimed gratuitously.

Gadhafi, who repressed his people and bankrolled terrorists, was doomed from the moment the United Nations Security Council passed a resolution last March authorizing a no-fly zone in Libya to protect its civilian population. With NATO aircraft bombing Gadhafi's military forces in thousands of sorties, the ragtag rebel army advanced, albeit slowly, and gradually wore down his loyalists. By the third week of August, they had captured Gadhafi's fortified compound in Tripoli and were planning to conquer Surt, his birthplace.

He was only 27 years old when he and a small group of junior army officers deposed King Idris, abolished the monarchy and proclaimed the Libyan Arab Republic. Fiercely anti-western, he closed U.S. and British military bases and nationalized oil fields. As well, he expelled ethnic Italians – the descendants of Italian settlers who moved to Libya after Italy's conquest in 1911 – and confiscated Jewish property.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

With Libya's fabulous oil wealth at his disposal, Gadhafi brought a measure of prosperity to his hitherto impoverished nation. He built public housing, roads, schools, clinics and hospitals. Hewing to his Green Book edict of "permanent revolution" and dispensing with the rule of law, he suppressed political dissent, shuttered parliament, murdered opponents and muzzled the media and non-governmental organizations. Under his watch, democracy ceased to exist.

An admirer of Gamal Abdel Nasser, Egypt's president from 1954 to 1970, Gadhafi aspired to replace him as leader of the Arab world. An acolyte of pan-Arabism, he attempted to forge merger agreements with Egypt, Sudan and Tunisia. But his overtures were rebuffed, and Libya fought a border war with Egypt in 1979. After turning his attention to Africa, Gadhafi cultivated ties with Idi Amin of Uganda, waged war with Chad and intervened militarily in the Central African Republic.

Under Gadhafi's leadership, Libya became a state sponsor of terrorism, backing the Irish Republican Army and the Red Brigades, among others. After Libyan agents detonated a bomb in a nightclub in Berlin, killing two U.S. soldiers, the United States bombed Libya.

Libyan operatives were additionally responsible for the deadliest act of terrorism attributed to Gadhafi, the downing of a Pan Am airliner over Lockerbie, Scotland, in 1988, with a loss of 259 passengers. As a result, Libya was subjected to severe United Nations economic sanctions.

Largely ostracized after Lockerbie, he emerged from the cold after condemning the terrorist events of Sept. 11, 2001, renouncing terrorism and agreeing to dismantle his weapons of mass destruction. His stock rose even higher after he handed over the Libyan agents behind Lockerbie, accepted responsibility for it and paid $2.7 billion in compensation. Nonetheless, he remained a wily and unpredictable figure.

Considering himself Nasser's natural successor, he injected himself into the Arab-Israeli conflict, calling for Israel's destruction and supporting radical Palestinian groups such as the Abu Nidal organization. During the Yom Kippur War, he dispatched military aircraft to Egypt.

About 7-1/2 months before that war broke out, the Israeli Air Force shot down a Libyan Arab Airlines plane en route to Cairo. Due to a navigational error, the airplane drifted into the Sinai Peninsula, held by Israel. Two Israeli Phantom jets fired warning shots, ordering Flight 114 to land. The French captain ignored the warning, prompting the Israeli pilots to fire at the Libyan plane. Flight 114 crashed into the desert while attempting an emergency landing. One hundred and eight of its 113 passengers were killed.

The Israeli defence minister, Moshe Dayan, would describe the incident as an "error of judgment" on Israel's part. Indeed, Israel paid compensation to the victim's families. Gadhafi, though incensed, did not retaliate. Instead, he upgraded his participation in anti-Israel activities.

After denouncing Egyptian president Anwar Sadat's historic rapprochement with Israel in 1977 as a betrayal of the Arab cause, he formed the Steadfastness and Confrontation Front to counter Egypt.

When Sadat was assassinated in 1981, Gadhafi praised the assassins. He condemned King Hassan of Morocco for hosting the Israeli prime minister, Shimon Peres, at a meeting. Responding to the 1993 Oslo accords, he expelled 30,000 Palestinian residents of Libya.

In 2003, one of Gadhafi's sons, Seif al-

Moammar Gadhafi

Islam, called for a one-state solution of the Arab-Israeli conflict, proposing that a secular binational Jewish-Arab state should supplant Israel and be known as Isratine. Under the plan, Palestinian refugees would be allowed to return to their former homes.

After adopting the proposal, Gadhafi wrote an opinion piece about it for the New York Times on Jan. 21, 2009. Rejecting "the tired rhetoric of partition and two-state solutions," Gadhafi called for a grand "compromise." He said, "The compromise is one state for all, an Isratine that would allow the people in each party to feel that they live in all of the disputed land and they are not deprived of any one part of it."

In this skewed spirit, Gadhafi made a distinction between Jews and Zionists. "We are not against Jews, but against Zionism," he told a delegation of Israeli Arab parliamentarians in 2010.

Gadhafi, having pledged to compensate Libyan Jews who had lost their property after emigrating, met with Jewish representatives to discuss the issue. But the problem was not resolved. With the current civil war raging, he invited representatives of the Libyan Jewish Diaspora to visit Libya. His invitation, viewed as a ploy to rebuff his tarnished image, was rejected.

By this juncture, Gadhafi was finished politically, a relic of Arab autocracy.

No child turned away from CHAT on financial grounds

Two years ago, in a CJN article, Shaviv speculated that "if the economics of private school education continue to be a problem, we may find parents will choose a four-year program of [Jewish] high school preceded by [public] elementary school." However, he said more recently that he's seen no evidence his prediction is coming true.

As well, the school has not seen any "noticeable increase" in subsidy requests.

Shaviv said that no child is turned away on financial grounds – assuming families are prepared to supply the requested documentation, including income tax forms, and that "parents are prepared to allocate an appropriate place for [tuition] in their family budget."

He added that tuition at TanenbaumCHAT has always been less expensive than at other private high schools in Ontario, "even though the amount of teaching we do is 50 per cent more.

At Branksome Hall, by comparison, tuition for the 2011-2012 year is $26,265 for junior kindergarten through Grade 10, and $28,265 for Grades 11 and 12. Last year's fees at the private girls' school were $25,450 for the lower grades and $27,450 for the higher grades.

TanenbaumCHAT has "an extremely rigorous budget and financial oversight program, and we keep our costs to the minimum," Shaviv said. Also, he pointed out, Jewish schools in Ontario do not receive government funding.

Tuition at Bnei Akiva Schools –Ulpanat Orot and Yeshivat Or Chaim – has increased from $19,900 last year to $21,400 this year, a seven per cent increase according to Rabbi Scot Berman, headmaster of the religious Zionist high school.

Like other administrators, he said that teachers' salaries constitute the school's biggest expense. "We certainly are interested in providing our teachers with a good salary," he said, adding that the school recently completed salary negotiations with its teachers.

Other costs include educational materials and technology, as well as administrative expenses.

"We make it our business to ensure that no student is turned away because of financial need," Rabbi Berman said. "We're committed to that, and parents know that."

Schools across North America are facing "what's been referred to as a tuition crisis," he noted. "The burden of high tuition is enormous."

Paul Shaviv

Because Bnei Akiva serves an Orthodox population, Jewish education is "a given" for families who send their children there, Rabbi Berman said. On average, he estimated, each Bnei Akiva family has four or five children, and often there is more than one attending the school at the same time. About forty per cent of school families receive financial assistance, constituting about 26 per cent of the school's budget, he said.

Even so, he added, some parents "don't want to go through the process of asking for a scholarship."

At Bialik Hebrew Day School, this year's tuition increase of three per cent is just under the rate of inflation.

Full-day tuition at Bialik (which offers only full-day classes, from junior kindergarten through Grade 8) is now $12,870, of which $1,075 is a capital levy that has been a longstanding part of the tuition amount, said Shana Harris, head of school. Other cost increases result from increases in teachers' salaries, she added. "We like to attract good teachers."

Enrolment at Bialik is up slightly, from 829 students last year to 834 expected this fall. As well, the number of subsidy requests at Bialik has increased slightly, but is "pretty stable," Harris said.

Mariana Catz, executive director of the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School reports that tuition is $14,750 for full-day classes (including senior kindergarten), compared to $14,250 last year. The school has 153 students, about 30 per cent of whom receive subsidies, and enrolment is growing, with a new kindergarten class opening this year.

Catz noted that the percentage of tuition being subsidized per student has increased.

Federation provides 30 cents per dollar of the subsidy, and the school has to raise the balance of the money, Catz said. Federation then reimburses the school for the subsidies.

At Associated Hebrew Schools, full-day tuition is up about five per cent to $13,025 for students up to Grade 6, and just under five per cent for Grade 7 and 8 students, to $13,525.

Preschool tuition has increased between four and 4-1/2 per cent, depending on whether a student attends full or half-day, and what year they are in.

Half-day senior kindergarten runs $6,290 compared to $6,090 last year, and full-day SK tuition is $12,290.

The increases are "pretty much" attributable to increases in teacher salaries, said Elliott Brodkin, the school's executive director and CFO. "We have agreement with our teachers [through] three different unions," he added, referring to teacher assistants, general studies teachers, and Judaic studies teachers.

He also noted that teachers' salaries "cascade" through a 10-year grid, and may even double from, say, $40,000 to $80,000 per teacher over that decade.

As well, Associated is "investing in curricular expenses like téchnology but also the integration of technology into the classroom."

Associated, which has a total of just over 1,600 students at three campuses, has the highest percentage of students receiving tuition subsidies of any school in Toronto. Last year, Brodkin said, 508 students of the 1,280 students in Grade 1 through Grade 8 received financial assistance. Preschool is not subsidized.

Enrolment hasn't been affected by tuition fees – it's "almost exactly the same, if not higher," Brodkin said.

However, he added, "there are families we know of that have left the school rather than apply [for subsidies]. There are some people who may have received it for years and don't want to ask for more."

Also, some families are asking for a higher subsidy than in the past.

Tuition subsidy funding from the federation is "very generous," said Brodkin. "But," he added, "that money's not growing."

To make up the shortfall, the school relies on contributions from major donors and annual campaign participants, and has been tightening its belt.

"We have been cutting expenses and overhead outside of the classroom. We have reduced administrative staff. We have cut back on one of our principal positions, which was planned, and we've cut back on some other administrative levels. We've cut days from some people. We're trying to make ourselves leaner. We've reduced costs for consultants and for professional development.

"The cost of education is not going down, and will not go down.

"Middle-class families have to decide for themselves what the priorities are for them." Also, he added, there are grandparents subsidizing their grandchildren's Jewish education – in general, and at Associated.

Associated in position of financial stability

The school has a financial advantage that some others don't. Brodkin pointed out. "We're in a position of financial stability in that we have three campuses we own outright. There is no debt at all... and many schools have rent to pay."

Eric Petersiel, head of school at Leo Baeck Day School, said that more than 80 per cent of the rising cost of tuition – just over six per cent at Leo Baeck this year to $12,900 – can be attributed to "the rising cost of having the best staff."

The school has a total of 855 students, down about 15 students from last year, at two campuses. It recently purchased its own building for the southern campus, which Petersiel said has not affected the tuition for this year. "Our job is to start an aggressive fundraising campaign to lessen the impact."

The cost of tuition is affecting parents' decisions to send their children to day school, Petersiel believes. One change that he has noticed in recent years is that parents are delaying entry to day school in favour of sending their children to junior and senior kindergarten at local public schools.

"That's difficult for us," he said. "We know that [preschool] is the foundation of Jewish education."

But, he said, Leo Baeck's northern campus in Thornhill is "stacked to the gills" in Grade 1. "We have more Grade 1s than ever before. We have three classes of 24 Grade 1s, and we have three tiny classes of senior kindergarten.

"People still want a Jewish education, but it's so difficult to afford. [Parents] made a choice to hold off."

About 10 per cent of Leo Baeck families receive tuition subsidies, an increase over years past. Some choose to leave the school, saying they still can't afford tuition, even with a subsidy, Petersiel said.

"I think that we are trying collectively to provide the best possible education, and that's expensive today. We hope everyone will come together to support day school education as a major issue for the community. It seems to take a back seat."

The CJN also contacted Eitz Chaim Schools, Netivot HaTorah Day School, the Toronto Heschel School and Robbins Hebrew Academy but did not hear back from them in time to report tuition fees.

Hockey players score for kids charity

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The sun is shining, flowers are blooming and warm breezes are blowing – so what could be a better summertime activity than to strap on the blades and go head to head with a bunch of former NHLers.

About 100 hockey-lovers aged 18 to 60 did just that recently at the Canlan Ice Arena at York University, skating with former pros Bill Derlago, Gary Leeman, Dennis Maruk, Jack Valiquette and others.

The event raised $40,000 for Chai Lifeline's Hockey 4 Life campaign.

The tournament is one of Chai Lifeline's big annual fundraising efforts and contributes to the organization's $850,000 annual budget.

Money raised "will to go to provide support for families dealing with severe illnesses," said Mordechai Rothman, director of Chai Lifeline Canada

Chai Lifeline provides a variety of services to families going through the emotionally challenging times dealing with children afflicted with serious illnesses, such as cancer, muscular dystrophy and cerebral palsy. About 160 families a year, many referred by social workers and medical professionals, benefit from the organization's resources, he said.

Volunteers recruited by Chai Lifeline provide tutoring services to youngsters forced by medical necessity to miss school, they arrange support groups and counselling for parents caring for stricken children, they arrange monthly family events such as trips to the Canadian National Exhibition, Ontario Place and Canada's Wonderland, and they arrange Big Brother-type support for siblings to provide respite to stressed-out families.

The captain of tournament-winning Fairlane, Ari Levine, centre, is pictured with his father, Jay, and brother, Adam. Ari is a cancer survivor who participated in Chai Lifeline's programs and services when he was younger and is now giving back through participating in the tournament.

One of the organization's signature events is a summer trip for sick children to Camp Simcha in upstate New York. This summer, 22 kids from the Toronto area were sent to the camp, which has a hospital on site, but provides regular camp activities and more, Rothman said.

"Our philosophy is to go over the top, anything to make these kids happy for two weeks," he said. That includes free helicopter rides, free hot-air balloon rides and even preparing whatever food the youngster wants, including hamburgers for breakfast.

The camp is a big hit among children and is something they look forward to all year, he said.

Other activities provided by Chai Lifeline include a trip to Disneyworld in Florida, scheduled for later this winter.

While the largest single fundraiser for Chai Lifeline is an annual winter concert at Roy Thomson Hall – last year Marvin Hamlisch headlined it – another big sports-oriented event is marathon running. Runners are asked to raise $3,600 and in exchange, Chai Lifeline covers marathoners' trips to races in Miami or Las Vegas.

The hockey fundraiser is a collaboration with Robert Cohen, president of Integrated mar.com. Players are recruited by Kerry Goulet, a veteran of the German league who is known in hockey circles for his charitable endeavours, said Rothman.

Is the Holocaust unique?

Eli Rubinstein
Special to The CJN

It's been said that the Holocaust is unique among all genocides.

Is it really? If so, how? And why does it matter?

The term genocide was coined by Rafael Lemkin, a Polish Jew. Most of his family was murdered during the Holocaust. In his younger years, Lemkin was troubled by the intentional mass murder of the Armenians by the Turks in 1915 and later the slaughter of Christian Assyrians by Iraqis in 1933. Lemkin dedicated his life to furthering the acceptance of the word genocide – and the need of the world community to ban its practice – after painstakingly documenting the brutal Nazi treatment of conquered populations throughout Europe in World War II.

In addition to their war against the Jews, the Nazis committed war crimes against a number of other groups, with the genocide of the Poles and the Gypsies (Roma and Sinti) being the most often-cited examples. The 20th century has, sadly, been rife with yet other genocides – Armenia (in the Ottoman Empire), Cambodia, Rwanda and Darfur are among the clearest examples.

Yet, as many have said, there is no point in comparing suffering. Jews were murdered in gas chambers, Ukrainians were starved to death on their farms, Poles were executed in town squares, Rwandans were hacked to death with machetes in their homes, Cambodians were shot in the fields in the countryside, Africans were thrown overboard on slave-trader ships in the Atlantic during the Middle Passage from Africa to the Americas – but how can one possibly measure who suffered more, and what would be the purpose of doing so?

Yet surely there is merit in examining the historical, theological, ideological, political and/or ethnic roots of each genocide, as well as the motivations of those who carried out the genocide, the methods in which it was implemented, the proportion of those who perished who were intended for destruction, the trauma caused by the impact of the genocide, and the ways in which the trauma was dealt with in the aftermath of the genocide.

In these areas, there are many parallels and distinctions to be drawn between each act of genocide. For example, regarding the murder of Poles and Ukrainians in the first half of the last century, the factors that led to their persecution have largely disappeared. But the racist, ideological prejudice against Jews – the very kind Hitler espoused – can still be found on neo-Nazi websites, in extremist Islamist rhetoric and in other subtler forms of antisemitism.

There can be no doubt, as one writer observed, that "the Holocaust has become the 'master narrative' for suffering, shaping discussions about every-present conflict over genocide and human rights." But is the Holocaust different in a substantial way from other examples of genocide? Does the Holocaust warrant more recognition, study and commemoration? How does one account for the enormous visibility that the Holocaust seems to have gained over the last number of decades?

Certainly, at first glance, there are aspects that seem to make the Holocaust stand out, even though all genocides are unique in their own way. The Holocaust is "uniquely unique" as some have described it, not just because of the staggering number of victims (indeed there are larger examples of mass murder), but because of the machinery of death created by the Nazis in pursuit of their goal. The sheer efficiency and the usage of modern technology to create assembly lines of death, where the "raw materials" were Jewish men, women and children, and the "finished product" was ash (while the side products were plundered Jewish possessions and bodies – gold teeth, hair etc.), cannot help but cause one to shudder. Perhaps these factors have caused the Holocaust to symbolize the level of ultimate evil to which humanity can descend and to garner the attention it has received.

More importantly, one may argue, is that conceptually, the Holocaust was different than all other genocides.

Here it's useful to draw upon what I once heard from Prof. Yehuda Bauer about what differentiates mass murder, genocide and the Holocaust.

Humanity's potential for evil beyond our worst fears

Mass murder is when large numbers of people are killed by a government or some other force. Genocide is when mass murder takes place on an ongoing basis, with the goal of destroying the culture and/or national existence of another people. Holocaust, unprecedented in human history, is mass murder plus genocide, plus the attempt to annihilate the existence of an entire group of people and wipe it off the face of the earth. This is what the Jews faced at the hands of the Nazis, and this didn't happen to anyone else during World War II, nor had it happened to anyone else before in history.

Prof. Gordon Dueck perhaps put it best: "When I emphasize the Jewish victims of Nazism, it is not because a Jewish life is worth more than a non-Jewish life – it's because, in the context of the Nazi worldview, a Jewish life was worth less than a non-Jewish life. Antisemitism wasn't ancillary to Nazism. It was at the very heart of it."

'The Nazis were looking for Jews, for all Jews'

What makes the Holocaust "unique" in Bauer's words (later, Bauer preferred the term "unprecedented"), is the combination of all three of these conditions: it was driven by ideological rather than pragmatic (land, resources etc.) reasons; it was global in reach, and the intended target was the entire Jewish people (from infancy to old age).

"The Nazis were looking for Jews, for all Jews," in his words.

When one understands this, one comes face to-face with the utter irrationality of the Holocaust. Most genocides involve a dispute over land, resources, or a desire to exploit or enslave another group or people for obvious material gain or to forcefully implement a specific political system. The Nazi genocide against the Jews was a pseudo-scientific and quasi-religious belief that maintained the very redemption of the world relied upon the "extermination" (and only "extermination") of every last Jew, to finally and totally rid the world of this contemptible "virus."

No course of action of any kind by the victim – supplication, conversion, bribery, slavery or exile – could ever suffice or placate the Nazi agenda.

Nazi antisemitism and its concomitant racial theories had only one ultimate solution to the Jewish problem: "The Final Solution" – mass death for the entire Jewish People.

No other mass murder or genocide was ever conceived or implemented on the basis of such an absolutist, maniacal worldview.

In light of all this, Bauer argues that, on the continuum, the Holocaust is the most extreme form of genocide and should be the starting point of any attempt to understand genocide – not because Holocaust victims suffered more than others, but because of its unprecedented nature.

The Holocaust, perhaps more than any other genocide, teaches us – warns us – that absent of restraint, humanity's potential for extreme evil and cruelty is virtually without limit, beyond our worst fears and even beyond our wildest imagination.

Of course, the deaths of victims of mass murder, genocide and Holocaust are all unjust and must be mourned by the world community.

Children of Holocaust survivors, and the extended Jewish People, still deeply mourn the loss of six million of their ancestors, and they do so in a very personal way (as do other communities who were victims of genocide). But, as citizens of the world, we must also commemorate the tragic losses of so many other innocent victims belonging to other peoples, both during World War II and during other periods of history.

Yet, even as we contend that the Holocaust, in its conception and implementation, was different from all other genocides, our tradition teaches us that all humanity is created in the image of God. Or as retired Lieut.-Gen. Romeo Dallaire, the French Canadian senator and humanitarian, reminds us: "No human is more human than any other."

Here is the main point: the victims of the various genocides throughout history may have perished for different reasons and under different circumstances – and this indeed is worthy of examination – but their lives were equally, infinitely and immeasurably sacred.

Our study of genocide should lead to the understanding of the fundamental equality of all members of the human family, their right to justice, freedom, and dignity, and to a place of greater compassion and empathy for all humanity.

This most difficult of subjects, in the words of Canadian writer Ruth Ozeki (spoken in another context, but surely applicable here), should cause us to reflect on the impermanence and preciousness of life, the fragility of the world, the extraordinary beauty of all living things, and our interdependence and interconnectedness. Ultimately, it should lead us to opening our hearts to all people, to resolving to do our best to end suffering in the world and to live together in peace.

Canadian Yeshiva offers classes to community this fall

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

The Canadian Yeshiva & Rabbinical School, which is expected to open its seminary next year, is offering classes to the general community beginning Sept. 12 and running through December.

One of the six classes will be taught by Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum, the school's founder and rosh yeshiva. His course, Jewish Theology as Embedded in the Jewish Prayer Book, is a University of Toronto credit course, as is Jewish Theology, which will be taught by Rabbi David Novak, a U of T faculty member.

Rabbi Wayne Allen will teach three classes: Talmud, Jewish Foundations of Western Values: Free Speech, and a session for university titled "Thursdays with Rabbi Allen at U of T."

As well, educator Rachael Turkienicz of Rachael's Centre for Torah, Mussar & Ethics, will teach an eight-part series on Rabbinic Theology.

Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum

Although the yeshiva is housed at U of T's St. Michael's College, three of the classes will be held at Kensington Place, on Sheppard Ave. West. Rabbi Allen's Thursday class will be held at the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life.

There is no tuition fee for the four non-credit courses, Rabbi Tanenbaum said. The classes are for "all those interested in deepening their Jewish studies in a serious way and willing to read and prepare, and who really want to learn.

"We want to share what classic Judaism is all about," he added.

Further plans for the yeshiva include chevruta-style classes at the yeshiva's beit midrash, which will "hopefully" open in January, Rabbi Tanenbaum told The CJN.

The yeshiva will have "special nights" for parent-child chevrutas as well as for couples, he said. To the best of his knowledge, this has not been done before in Toronto.

In the meantime, the yeshiva is seeking donations of "all kinds of sforim," ranging from Talmudic dictionaries to biblical and halachic commentaries.

סיפור אהבה ארץ ישראלי-לא להחמיץ

ישראל-חום יולי אוגוסט 2011

Organ donation activist takes it one step at a time

Laura Fixman
Intern

George Marcello wanted to thank the person who gave him a liver that saved his life so he decided he would walk across Canada.

Marcello received a donated liver in 1995, and in 2000, he decided that a 12,000-kilometre walk across Canada, which ended up taking 769 days, would be the best way to express his gratitude. He was also inspired to found the Step by Step Organ Transplant Association in 1998, an organization that makes organ donation easier.

"Writing a letter just wasn't a good enough way to express my gratitude," he said. "I didn't know how to sing or dance, but I knew how to walk."

In October, Marcello is bringing Palestinian Ismael Khatib to Canada to share the story of his son, Ahmed, who was killed at age 12 and whose organs were donated to several Israeli children. Marcello said Khatib was honoured to be asked to come to Canada, and that it would be a way to encourage people to consider organ donation.

"Inspirational stories like Mr. Khatib's are needed to do away with misconceptions about organ donation," he said. "It's a way to bring the world closer together."

He hopes to take the torch of life –which was first lit at the start of Marcello's Canada-wide walk – on a world tour to at least 20 countries in 2012.

He said he wanted to take the torch to Israel to meet Khatib, but he didn't have the funds, so instead, with the help of a sponsor, he is bringing Khatib to Canada instead.

Marcello received the torch of life anonymously one week before he began his walk. He carried the lit torch throughout his walk, and he said he started giving it to other people to carry for portions of the walk and that it became a symbol of hope for many people.

George Marcello presents the Torch of Life to Pope John Paul II in 2001.

Marcello added that Pope John Paul II eventually heard of the torch and wanted to bless it. When Marcello got a call from the Vatican, he said he thought it was a joke, but when he realized it wasn't, he was honoured. He said the Pope gave him good advice on what to do after he finished his walk.

"In his legacy, the Pope was trying to get all the faiths and cultures together," Marcello said. "The gift of organ donation is given on an unconditional basis. It doesn't matter what race, religion or culture you are."

Many times Marcello was overwhelmed and wanted to give up and shut down the torch, but he said there was always something that would happen that would keep him going.

One of these inspirations came when an Afghani-Canadian asked him for advice on walking across Canada to show his gratitude for his Canadian citizenship. Around the same time, a Pakistani woman asked Marcello for advice on getting a donated liver for her father. Marcello suggested the Afghan-Canadian man walk for the woman's father and that renewed interest in the torch of life.

Marcello added that people often question the sanity of his walking across Canada, and he admitted doing so required at least a bit of insanity. He had to face dangers, including bears, pneumonia, trucks and cougars.

"It started with one small step and I didn't know where this was going to go," he said. "I must have wanted to give up a million times, but there was always something urging me to take the next step."

Marcello said his most avid supporters are members of the Jewish community. The Canadian tour for Khatib will be sponsored by the Canadian Peres Centre for Peace, and he said Arie Raif of the Peres Centre was very supportive in the conversation they've had. Marcello added that Montreal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler has recently pledged 100 per cent support to the torch of life.

In Febuary 2012, the torch begins a four-year journey, starting at the Pope John Paul II Cultural Centre in Washington D.C. The torch will then go through 200 countries. Marcello hopes that many young people will participate in carrying it. He added that he would like to webcast the entire journey on the Step by Step website.

In a perfect world, Marcello said that no one would die waiting for an organ transplant, and he continues Step by Step to get closer to that goal. He hopes that people will consider organ donation because of his efforts and will make their desires known to their immediate family.

"Please don't take your organs to heaven because God knows we need them here on Earth," he said.

Torah from Terror

It was the 11th of September 2001. It was also the 23rd of Elul 5761. And when Jews streamed into synagogues to observe Rosh Hashanah less than one week later, they were searching for answers to cope with the horrors they had just witnessed and lived through.

Rabbis dispensed with the Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur sermons they had prepared and wrote new ones. Theirs were words of grief, anger and consolation.

A decade later, we are able to look back at those speeches thanks to the efforts of Rabbi Neil Gillman, a professor of Jewish philosophy at the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, and Jason Miller of the JTS rabbinical school. They reproduced more than 100 sermons on the website, Torah from Terror: The Rabbinic Response to 9-11. Although that original site is now defunct, another incredible website, archive.org, has preserved Torah from Terror so that it can still be read in its entirety. [http://bit.ly/tft20]

Some excerpts from Torah from Terror:

Rabbi Jerome M. Epstein, United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism:

"The real martyrs last week were not the terrorists but the firemen and the policemen who gave their lives in an attempt to save others because they bore witness to God... The real martyrs are those whose lives are taken only because of their desire to walk in the image of a loving God. They are God's witnesses. The shofar's call to us to become God's witness, His partner in building a more perfect world, presents an awesome challenge. But, that is the challenge. For the Jew, one need not be a martyr to be God's witness." [http://bit.ly/tft12]

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

Rabbi Wayne Dosick, The Elijah Minyan, San Diego, Calif.:

"And the great question always looms, 'Who shall live, and who die? Who shall live out the measure of days, and who will be cut off midway?' The answers to those questions, we know, are in God's hands. Yet, this year, as we gather for our Yom Kippur worship and meditation, we are filled with wondering. For the Divine response that was given to us this year is bewildering, and overwhelming, and filled with pain." [http://bit.ly/tft13]

Rabbi Ruth M. Gais, The New York Kollel at Hebrew Union College, New York:

"Thousands lived. Thousands died and are still buried in the pit of death./ I have no answer why some lived and some died./ I have no answer for why there is such hatred in the world./ Ani Ma'aminah be'emunah shlemah/ I do believe with perfect faith/ I do believe with perfect faith that God is good./ I do believe with perfect faith that God is the creator of good and evil./ I do believe that God has granted us free will to choose one or the other./ I do believe that God has not hidden His face from us./ I do believe that God reveals that face through every act of love and mercy and pity that we do." [http://bit.ly/tft17]

Havdalah by the lake

Summer camp lore tells the story of a young boy who trudges off to overnight camp for the first time.

On Saturday night, as the stars come out, the boy gathers with all the campers and counsellors in a large circle by the lake. Swaying arm in arm, they sing a song led by a guitar player. Three campers enter the middle of the circle – one holds a multi-braided candle that flickers against the still waters of the lake, a second slowly passes sweet-smelling spices around the circle, and a third, grasping a cup of grape juice, sings the blessings of Havdalah while the campers and staff hum in the background. The little boy is so taken by the spirit of Havdalah that, in his next letter home, he describes the moving scene to his parents.

Upon the child's return home life proceeds as usual – just as it was before camp. On Saturday night, however, his mother calls him into the kitchen and proudly presents him with a braided candle, a sachet of spices and a cup of grape juice. The boy looks bewildered at his mother and says, "Mom, how can we make Havdalah without a lake?"

As summer draws to a close and thousands of young people unpack their camp duffel bags and load their school backpacks, the "siloed" nature of Jewish education is drawn into focus. Even for those who have the richest ongoing Jewish educations – camps coupled with synagogues, day schools augmented by youth movements and trips to Israel – the tapestry of experiences is belittled by the disjointed and often divisive nature of the institutions.

Class Act

Daniel Held

We struggle to co-ordinate on even the most basic levels. Youth movement programs conflict with school exams and, even during slower times in the academic calendar, schools are reticent to release students for powerful, identity-building activities. Summer camps, youth movements and synagogues, even those stemming from the same denomination, fail to collaborate in engagement and education. But if we can't co-ordinate the mundane details of sharing calendars and resources, how can we expect to spiral curriculum and build a coherent and holistic educational system?

I look forward to the day when Jewish school teachers serve as educators at camps; when the Shabbat curriculum in a supplementary school is augmented by a Shabbaton organized by the synagogue's youth movement; when the day school class on tithing is brought into reality at the Kavanah Garden; when synagogue rabbis build relationships with campers during their visit to camp that extend through the High Holidays and into regular Shabbat services.

The story of our young camper's Havdalah by the lake is a critique of camp's isolation from the reality of year-round Jewish living. At the same time, it tells the powerful story of parents who are building bridges between Jewish experiences that are often walled off by institutional boundaries.

More of us, both professional leaders and parents, need to pick up this mantle of integration. In forging a Jewish system of education, we need to help our campers, students, sons and daughters find the narrative thread of Jewish experiences that runs from camp to home to school and back again.

We must respond to African famine

JTA

Guest Voice

Caryl M. Stern

A tragedy is unfolding in the Horn of Africa, where hundreds of thousands of children are at immediate risk of death. The disastrous combination of the worst drought in 60 years, high food prices and regional conflict has left 12 million people, including more than two million malnourished children, in urgent need of humanitarian assistance.

A huge migration is now taking place from the areas of southern Somalia that have been engulfed in famine to the capital, Mogadishu, and to neighbouring Kenya, Ethiopia and Djibouti. Mothers carry their infants for days or weeks on end, desperate to find them nourishment, clean water and medical assistance. Some have been forced to make an unthinkable "Sophie's choice," about which child to feed and which to allow to die – a decision no parent should ever have to make.

The next rains are not due to arrive until October, meaning that no new harvests can be expected in the region before the end of the year. Unless aid to affected areas increases significantly, the famine will likely spread and intensify, putting many more young lives in jeopardy. However, despite the scale of this catastrophe, the drought and famine in the Horn of Africa have not consistently made headlines, nor have these scourges caught the attention of many Americans. The international donor community, so quick to mobilize after similar disasters, has been slow to respond to the situation in Somalia this summer. This catastrophe is not on the public agenda, but it urgently needs to be.

With this in mind, I turn to the Jewish community – my community – for support in our efforts to save the lives of children threatened by conditions beyond their control. After serving nearly two decades in Jewish communal life, I have spent the past five years as president and CEO of the U.S. Fund for UNICEF, which is one of several entities trying to get aid to the afflicted area.

My worldview, personally and professionally, has been shaped by a commitment to tikkun olam. It comes from my mother, who was a child in Vienna during Kristallnacht. She survived the Holocaust by being sent to the United States in 1939, at the age of six, along with her four-year-old brother and a woman she never saw again after they arrived. They were raised for two years in an orphanage for Jewish refugee children on New York's Lower East Side.

Today, it is in the Horn of Africa where children's survival is most in peril. More than 400,000 refugees, the vast majority of whom are women and children, are crowded into three refugee camps in Kenya. Aid organizations are there, but the needs are tremendous.

In Somalia, the epicentre of the emergency, tens of thousands of people – mainly children – have died in the last few months. UNICEF and other humanitarian groups are reaching thousands of malnourished children with nutritional supplies. One highly effective weapon is a nutritional peanut paste that is saving lives. But many more are threatened and will perish if we don't act quickly.

Humanity is facing a devastating crisis in the Horn of Africa, and our help is needed.

Caryl M. Stern is president and CEO of the U.S. Fund for UNICEF.

God always welcomes our tshuvah

Sephardi Window

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

Last week was the first day of a bike camp that my younger son, Nissim, was set to attend. As he was about to leave the house, my wife saw a look of trepidation on his face, and, speaking with him, it seems he was nervous about how he'd do at camp. He'd already started to ride a bike, but this was an event outside the family with other kids his own age.

Having been reassured that everything would work out, Nissim began the fateful first day. When I picked him up at the end of the day, he was positively beaming. He was extremely proud that the counsellor felt he was the best bike rider there and was to be moved from the expected Level 1 to Level 3!

A few days later, I picked up Nissim at camp and saw a boy with a drawn, sad face climb into the car. It turns out that he had fallen from the bike, got a scratch on his arm – which one would have thought from his expression was a mortal wound – and, on top of this "tragedy," he had been stung by a wasp.

Not a good day for our hero.

I hugged him, and, after a few minutes of silence, I told him things like this happen to everyone. He listened quietly as I attempted to console and encourage him. We got home, where his mother did what mothers do, and soon Nissim returned to his old (six-year-old) self.

This event got me thinking that, of course, discouraging things happen to adults, too, and I thought of a line in my siddur (Livorno), "You give a hand to sinners because Your right [hand] is open to accept those who return [to the right path]."

We Jews are fortunate that we always have a way back, and, moreover, we don't have to go to the CAA for a road map. God has given us explicit instructions on how to return to the right path.

This way, of course, is called tshuvah.

Once we understand that we've made a mistake in our behaviour, then demonstrate true contrition by making restitution, and, finally, devising a realistic response if the identical circumstances that lead to our sin in the first place arise again, we're ready for a "return."

I say "ready" because we attain the highest level of tshuvah when we've been tested with the same situation that led to our averah (transgression). I hasten to say that, even if we are never tested in exactly the same way again, this does not mean our tshuvah is not valid.

We shall forever have the opportunity to do tshuvah. The Rambam says (Hilchot Tshuva, 2A), "Even if one sinned his whole life and repented [only] on his dying day... all of his sins are forgiven." Simply put, it's never too late to stand up when we fall.

Let us remember that, whatever the adversity we confront as we struggle to live as Jews, our Father in heaven continues to care for us – and welcomes our tshuvah.

As we near the High Holidays, I wish you all a sweet and happy year.

Volunteer feels like part of the team

Laura Fixman
Intern

Yoelit Lipinsky, 23, said she was honoured just to be nominated for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Top 20 Under 40 award earlier this year.

She was awarded the "Gevurah" – or strength – award at an event last April for her service to the community.

"It was an amazing honour. I'm still reeling from the lovely event," Lipinsky said. "It was a shock to be sure, and I will try to do that award justice each and every day."

In addition to volunteering at Mount Sinai Hospital, she has been a creative and marketing intern for the Canadian Friends of Haifa Foundation and was active in Hillel at the University of Toronto.

Lipinsky said that although volunteering is a way to help others, it also helps her personally.

"I feel the benefits far outweigh the time and commitment," she said. "Just to put a smile on someone's face or to have someone say 'Thank you' puts a spring in your step."

Lipinsky began volunteering at Mount Sinai as part of the Kohn Summer Intern Program in 2009. She has volunteered in several departments, including marketing, volunteer services, the Max and Beatrice Wolfe Children's Centre and Dr. Bruce Ballon's SIMone program.

Yoelit Lipinsky

For her, the best part was having different experiences that suited her skills and career goals.

"I was so humbled by the trust staff instilled in me," Lipinsky said. "I never felt as simply the volunteer. I always felt part of the team."

She also plans to continue to make tikkun olam a part of her life in the future.

Lipinsky is going to Kingston, Ont., for a year to pursue a master's of public administration at Queen's University, but she hopes to continue her work with Mount Sinai in the future. She also hopes to use her degrees in public policy, religion and bioethics to draft health policy and help create a viable and ethical healthcare system.

"In a multicultural community, medicine is more aware of religion's influence on health-care issues," she said. "I will be able to emphasize the voices of the patients. Medicine is a symbiotic relationship between physician and patient. I wish to broaden the perception of the medical community with the greatest respect for the professionals and the cultures that create our country."

During her time at Mount Sinai, she developed a motto – "healing with heart" – that stemmed from seeing the staff's devotion to patient care every time she walked through hospital.

"The basest of human needs is to be loved and appreciated," she said. "We perform tasks with a smile and offer a very human touch in what is becoming a very digitized world. Modern medicine has incredible technologies, but we are the hearts that allow it not only to operate but to heal."

Lipinsky wanted to bring something new to her role as volunteer co-ordinator, and she wanted to make use of her experience publishing posters and journals. She worked with another intern to create VolunCHEER, a newsletter for the hospital's volunteer services department. Although it was successful, it didn't go beyond one issue, because it would have been too much work to continue on a volunteer basis.

She added that she wanted to thank the volunteer services team at Mount Sinai, including Joanne Fine-Schwebel, Lesli Herman and Faith White.

"They cheered me on relentlessly, and they are a huge contributing factor to my enjoying my experience at Mount Sinai," she said.

She said the women are the glue that holds the more than 300 Mount Sinai volunteers together.

"When you are greeted with a smile or a joke or asked to sit down and talk about what's new in your life or some celebrity's, it creates a very personal connection," Lipinsky said.

Lakoff agued that because the "Israeli government has chosen to censor its own journalists and foreign journalists, we can no longer collaborate with such media organizations."

He then added the motion does not call for a boycott of all Israeli journalists, since "there are some journalists in Israel who are doing wonderful work getting some real news stories out."

Shelley Robinson, the NCRA's executive director, who clarified that a press release celebrating the passing of the motion was attributed to NCRA despite having been written by CKUT members, said it's important the NCRA "not editorialize" or voice an opinion about the motion.

She did, however, acknowledge there was "a lot of internal debate" and "diversity of opinion" on the subject.

"Definitely some members feel this is not the kind of work we should be doing, but on the other hand, there are some members who feel very strongly it is," she said.

Although the number of members who voted for and against the motion wasn't recorded, Robinson said it passed with a majority vote of at least 51 per cent.

She said some people during the meeting raised concerns about member stations' ability to remain objective in light of the motion.

"But this motion is non-binding, so if they wanted to do something with Ha'aretz or other Israeli media institutions, they would absolutely be free to do so," Robinson said.

She said despite the strong language that calls on member stations to refrain from working with Israeli media, "it is very clear to our membership that this is non-binding. There is no one who wants to do this work who feels like they can't because of this motion."

She added that the motion, doesn't "mean a ton in practice and I'm not trying to undercut it for those who think it is very meaningful, but a lot of people who feel like this kind of work is very powerful speak of it in terms of solidarity and not in terms of tangible consequences."

She said that based on the conversations taking place on the NCRA listserv, "there is a whole range of opinions on this issue."

NCRA stations must renew their memberships annually, and as of June, only 23 had done so, but according to its website, it had 82 member stations in 2010.

> 'It is very clear to our membership that this is non-binding'

Member stations such as CKHC Radio Humber in Toronto and CHOU and CKCU in Ottawa did not respond to requests for interviews, while CFRC, Kingston's campus station, and York University's CHRY refused to comment. (CIUT, at the University of Toronto, one of the country's largest campus stations, is not a NCRA member.)

Sarah Buchanan, programming director for CJSF, Simon Fraser University's radio station, explained to The CJN why her station chose to abstain from the vote.

"There are a lot of people with strong opinions on both sides, so we decided that the best thing to do would be to abstain, since we didn't want to throw our vote in any one direction, when there was such a diversity of opinion."

Buchanan said much of the internal debate at her station centred on its role as a media organization.

"Some felt it was important to take a stand on these issues, and some felt it was important not to come down on any one side of a political issue, since we're connected with the media," she said.

"Another issue was that some of the wording was quite strong, especially the main resolution that calls for the boycott, sanctions and divestment against Israel. That was called into question for not being appropriate for a media organization."

Buchanan added that her station felt that being told its staff shouldn't speak to certain organizations might limit their own journalistic freedom.

Canadian Federation of Jewish Students' vice-president of external relations, Emile Scheffel, said he's encouraged the NCRA has chosen not to draw attention to the passing of the motion.

"It's kind of buried on their website. Obviously, they adopted it, but it doesn't seem to be something they're planning to run with in a big way and make a big splash with," Scheffel said.

Responding to Lakoff's claims that the Israeli government censors the media, he said while Israel does have "regulations about what the media can publish with respect to security issues," Israel is one of the few countries in the Middle East where freedom of the press is respected.

"Each and every day in Israel, there is a vigorous debate about a whole range of issues in the media that includes the conflict. Left-wing anti-occupation voices are heard, Israeli Arab voices are routinely expressed, and it is sad that they would boycott such a vibrant and vigorous media culture of debate that Israel has," Scheffel said.

Antisemitic rally held at Queen's Park

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The video starts innocuously enough with the introduction of Karin Brothers "from the United Church of Canada," who intones a bland pronouncement of inclusiveness – "We need you."

Subsequent speakers at the Al Quds Day Rally, held Aug. 28 at Queen's Park, however, jacked up the rhetoric to levels that the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) believes was antisemitic.

Imam Zafar Bangash of the Islamic Society of York Region, said the U.S. president "would rather have Americans starve to death, but he cannot say no to the Zionist parasitical state." He referred to the United States as a "stooge government" and to Barack Obama as "this black man in the White House."

As rally participants waved flags of Hezbollah – a banned terrorist organization – Bangash went on to call Zionists "racist," "inhuman," and "barbarians."

Maulana Asad Jafri, described as a Khomeinist student from Qoms, Iran, said "whenever you see injustice happen, there is a one per cent, two per cent, 100 per cent involvement by the Zionist regime, the same Zionist regime that sucks the resources, the blood and everything that belongs to the people all across the world."

The video was shot by a CIJA staffer and posted on YouTube. It received more than 1,300 hits in its first few days on the Internet.

Steve McDonald, associate director of communications for CIJA, said the video has been offered to the media and posted online as "all Canadians need to see the sort of things said… in the guise of criticism of Israel when in fact all kinds of antisemitic things are coming out here."

McDonald pointed out the Al Quds Day Rally was created by Iran's Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini in 1979, while the Toronto version was sponsored by CASMO, the Canadian Shia Muslims Organization.

An open letter to the community

It's up to the Jewish and pro-Israel community to make a difference in the upcoming elections in Ontario and Manitoba.

Over the coming few weeks, you have a choice to make: a choice that goes beyond who will be premier in Ontario or Manitoba, and which members will sit, respectively, in Queen's Park and in the Manitoba legislature. You can choose to sit on the sidelines of the campaign, allowing others to shape the future of our province and community, or with just a small effort, you can give voice to your values and ensure the continued vibrancy and impact of the Canadian Jewish community.

In Canada, the Jewish community comprises only 1.1 per cent of the population, and that number is expected to decrease as time goes on. In order to ensure that our community's values and concerns continue to resonate at every level of government, it is imperative that each of us embrace our democratic responsibilities, and thus ensure our voice is heard.

The Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC) is a national, multi-partisan organization dedicated to achieving that goal by getting the Jewish community involved in the political process (and within all parties). We are here to help you get involved with the campaign of your choice, including providing information, training, connecting volunteers and facilitating political support. With even a small contribution of time or money, you can have a significant impact on the political system.

So what can you do?

1. It's up to you to get informed.

Learn more about where the candidates and parties stand on these issues. Stay informed by reading the newspaper, watching the news and being active politically in your riding. Visit itsup2you.ca for links to party websites, information on voting and information on what you can do to make a difference.

2. It's up to you to get involved.

Volunteering for an election campaign is a great way to build relationships with MPPs, MLAs and other decision makers. These relationships are essential to ensuring our collective voice is heard. It's also a great opportunity for networking, professional development and community involvement. Those who have volunteered in the past know how important and fun it can be. Getting involved in a campaign is easier than you think: fill out our volunteer form at itsup2you.ca and CJPAC will pair you with the campaign of your choice. If you are a high school student, this counts toward your volunteer hours.

3. It's up to you to support candidates.

Many people do not know how easy it is to support candidates in a significant way. Every dollar counts, and there are generous tax credits for political donations. You can target your support and make sure you are involved in an effective way. Every dollar donated should be sent with the message, "Thank you on behalf of the Jewish community for your support of our issues." Call Jonathan Ain at 1-866-929-9552, ext. 238, for more information on how to make your political dollars count for the Jewish community.

4. Most of all, it's up to you to vote.

By exercising your right to vote, you have a say in charting your province's course on issues of importance to you and the community. Find out more about voting rules and locations at www.itsup2you.ca.

Together, we can protect and build our community's voice across the political spectrum. Remember – it's up to you!

Stephen Polevoy

Camp Northland staffer celebrates 40 years

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

In his wildest dreams, Stephen Polevoy never thought that Camp Northland would become his life's work.

After spending his 40th summer working at the Haliburton, Ont., camp, however, Polevoy, the assistant director and business manager, said the kids have kept him coming back.

A teacher by profession who has spent seven decades in camping, Polevoy, who was honoured at camp with a surprise party, says the "kids energize me. I love to see them succeed, and I love it when they conquer their fears of certain activities such as climbing ropes and water skiing.

"I've seen campers grow up to become staff and head staff, and I stay interested in how their lives unfold. Camp is our common bond," said Polevoy, whose wife and two daughters all went to Camp Northland.

The spirit at Camp Northland – which is overseen by the Jewish Camp Council of Toronto – is "unbelievable," he said. "Many campers and staff eat and sleep camp 12 months a year. The day they leave, they count the days until they can return. Campers can't wait to become counsellors, and counsellors can't think about leaving."

He admits it's not an easy job. "For eight weeks, I'm on duty 24 hours a day, seven days a week. I'm always responsible for the campers and staff. I don't take a day off, and I hardly sleep. I wouldn't have it any other way, though."

In September, he said, after wrapping up the season – he has worked full time for the camp since 1978 – they start planning for the following year. "We run camp for 2-1/2 months, and the rest of the year is spent preparing and closing. That takes more time than the actual running."

Nicole Markowitz, executive director of the Jewish Camp Council of Toronto, and director of Camp Northland, called "Mr. P." the heart and soul of the camp.

"He does what it takes to make the summer memorable. He's the tooth fairy, he supplies the puzzle of the day, and he's the camp photographer. That is on top of his duties, which include managing supplies for the kitchen, health centre and maintenance staff. He maintains the foundation of the camp."

Hersh Glass, a member of the Jewish Camp Council of Toronto's board of directors, said he spent 17 years at Camp Northland, as a camper, counsellor and then section head. "Mr. P. was there the entire time, and he saw me grow up."

Polevoy's energy is remarkable, he said. "He brings a tremendous positive force."

WWII ace died trying to fight for Israel

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf

HAMILTON — They called him The Falcon of Malta.

George "Buzz" Buerling, a kid in his twenties from Verdun, Que., was one of the top fighter pilots for the Allies in World War II. And he likely would have been the Machal's top fighter pilot during Israel's 1948 War of Independence but for his untimely demise.

On Sept. 1, the Israeli Air Force-fighter-who-might-have-been was posthumously honoured by the Canadian Warplane Heritage Museum with the unveiling of a life-sized, bronze statue of his likeness at a ceremony at Hamilton International Airport.

The statue will remain on permanent display at the museum.

Between 1942 and 1944, Buerling gained renown as an ace pilot for the Royal Air Force, when he was stationed in Malta and single-handedly notched 29 kills of enemy aircraft during the Axis siege of the island nation, mostly while piloting a Spitfire VC.

Though he desperately wanted to fly for Canada, the Royal Canadian Air Force initially refused to enlist him because he lacked a high school diploma. They later accepted him after his heroic exploits in the war.

History records him as somewhat of a rebel – Buerling was known to flout air force protocols as a matter of course. But at the ceremony last week, his brother, Rick, and other guest speakers, among them Hamilton Mayor Bob Bratina, Israeli Consul General for Toronto and western Canada Amir Gissin, and the museum's chairman, William L. Koyle, clarified that Buerling simply chafed under mundane orders from his commanders and the envy of his fellow pilots, because he knew his skills far exceeded those of all other pilots and he only wanted to dogfight with the enemy as much as possible.

In 1944, Buerling received an honourable discharge from the RCAF. But unable to adjust to civilian life, by 1948, at age 26, he decided to contact the Haganah through channels in Montreal to ask about joining the nascent Israeli Air Force.

Buerling, a devout Christian, had been raised to love both the People and Land of Israel and felt compelled to serve the fledgling Jewish state, according to his brother.

"He was one of the gentiles who believed in the promise of Israel," Rick said.

Word of Buerling's interest in fighting for Israel reached Harold "Smoky" Simon, chief of air operations for the IAF, who quickly agreed to recruit Buerling to fly P-51 Mustangs in the elite 101 squadron.

But Buerling never got the chance.

En route to Israel, his Noorduyn Norseman transport plane, a specialty aircraft manufactured in Montreal that he was to deliver as his first mission for the IAF, exploded and crashed while on approach to Aeroporto dell'Urbe in Rome. Sabotage was suspected, but never proven.

Buerling's body was taken to Israel, where it was buried in Haifa's military cemetery.

Simon, currently head of World Machal, told The CJN that Buerling "would have been a tremendous asset to Israel. It was such a tragedy."

He added: "It said something about the men who wanted to come fight for Israel despite knowing that they would be doing so with inferior supplies and weapons."

Gissin praised Buerling's wartime heroics, describing him as a "special pilot... who chose to fight against evil, because it was the right thing to do."

Media must stop ignoring Palestinian rejectionism

In Ramallah on Aug. 27, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas made an important statement that was reported in the Israeli media but ignored by the international media. He insisted that the Palestinian Authority will not recognize Israel as a Jewish state, and even rebuked the Mideast Quartet – the United States, United Nations, European Union and Russia – for stipulating that the Palestinians need to adopt this position. "Don't order us to recognize a Jewish state. We won't accept it," he declared.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

This is not the first time Abbas has expressed this view, but it's quite possibly the most emphatic he's been. As Ynet reported the following day, it shows that he's adopted a belligerent tone ahead of his gambit at the United Nations later this month to gain statehood recognition.

The subject of accepting or rejecting Israel as the homeland of the Jewish people is not a trivial or technical matter involving mere definition. In 2009, according to Reuters, Abbas sarcastically said: "It is not my job to give a description of the state. Name yourself the Hebrew Socialist Republic – it is none of my business."

But what evidently is his business, in keeping with past Palestinian leadership, is to deny that Jews have any legitimate historical attachment to Israel, foremost to Jerusalem. (This is why, for instance, during the Camp David summit in 2000, then-PA president Yasser Arafat utterly dismayed Israeli negotiators by insisting the Western Wall is in Nablus!)

This refusal to acknowledge the legitimacy of Jewish sovereignty is tied to the PA insistence (which, contrary to popular misconception, has no basis in international law) that Palestinian refugees from the 1948 war and their descendants, whom PA leaders number at about five million, have a "right of return" to Israel. If the Palestinian leadership were willing to accept Israel as the Jewish state, they would in effect forfeit this claimed "right" that they have long claimed as a sacrosanct principle. It remains so even for those who, like Abbas, have occasionally said, if only for tactical reasons, that for the sake of Israel's "demographic concerns," they would be willing to limit the number of refugees who would actually return.

Mahmoud Abbas

Pollsters, both Middle Eastern and western, who ask Palestinians whether they accept a "two-state" solution, but then fail to follow this up by asking the essential question of whether they're willing to forgo the "right of return," are not providing an accurate picture of Palestinian attitudes. And journalists who frequently report on the former but pay no attention to the latter also fail to convey an accurate account.

Among prominent Palestinians, only Sari Nusseibeh, currently president of Al-Quds University and formerly a PLO representative, had the courage to say what has needed to be said all along about what constitutes a genuine two-state deal. He told the New York Times in 2001: "The Palestinians have to realize that if we are to reach an agreement on two states, then those two states will have to be one for the Israelis and one for the Palestinians, not one for the Palestinians and the other also for the Palestinians."

Yet what Nusseibeh warned against is precisely what the PA insists upon. In the Aug. 28 Jerusalem Post, Khaled Abu Toameh reported that Abbas told the Jordanian newspaper Ad-Dustour that even after the UN recognizes a Palestinian state (along the June 4, 1967 lines), the Palestinians will continue to demand the return of millions of refugees to Israel "on the basis of international legitimacy."

In other words, Abbas is not just pursuing (in violation of binding agreements to negotiate with Israel) international recognition of a Palestinian state. He's also advocating a program that will lead to Israel's disappearance as a state envisioned by the UN itself in 1947 – a homeland for the Jewish people.

It's time for the western media to start paying attention to this persistent Palestinian intolerance and rejectionism.

Montreal gets new envoy

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The new Israeli consul general in Montreal, Joel Lion, comes to town after a hectic two years in New York, where he served as spokesperson for the Israeli Consulate.

He's a French-born Orthodox rabbi who has been a career diplomat since 1993. His Wikipedia entry includes photos of him with ABC News' Christiane Amanpour and American media personality Glenn Beck.

Joel Lion (pronounced Yo-el Lee-on) replaces Yoram Elron, who has returned to Israel after four years.

Joel Lion

"It was a challenging job, to put it mildly," Lion said of his time in New York. While there, he said in an interview, he worked with the national and local media, as well as with at least six correspondents for the Israeli press.

He prepared them for two visits each by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and President Shimon Peres, and one by Defence Minister Ehud Barak and numerous other dignitaries.

As consul for media affairs and head of a departmental staff of six, he often responded to content concerning Israel, even in the New York Times. In June, for example, he pointed out in a letter that a news article, headlined "Americans are joining flotilla to protest Israeli blockade," failed to mention that the U.S. State Department held the position that any attempt to break Israel's maritime blockade would be considered "an act of provocation" since other means of getting humanitarian assistance to Gaza were in place.

Government seeks fundraisers for Holocaust monument

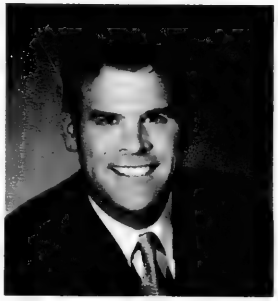
Compiled by CJN Staff

OTTAWA — The government is seeking people to sit on a council to support the National Holocaust Monument, which will be built in Ottawa, said John Baird, foreign affairs minister and minister responsible for the National Capital Commission.

The project is the result of a private member's bill and was supported by all parties in the House of Commons. It received royal assent on March 25.

Baird, who will oversee the planning, construction and maintenance of the monument, said in a press release that the monument would not only preserve the memory of victims of the Holocaust "but will also educate visitors of all faiths and traditions about the causes and risks of hate. Let us use the lessons of the past to remind us of the importance of tolerance, to inspire us to uphold human rights and to prevent future acts of genocide."

Tim Uppal, minister of state for democratic reform and member of Parliament for Edmonton-Sherwood Park, who introduced the bill, said that the "monument will serve as a symbol of Canadian value and diversity as much as it will be a memorial for the millions of victims and families destroyed.



John Baird

"The monument will recognize how Canadians and Canadian history have been affected, and that we will continue to stand against any forces that oppose our essential principles.

"We must never allow the crimes of the past to be repeated or forgotten. The monument will remind us that we must be vigilant in standing guard against hatred and tyrant rulers while promoting freedom for all peoples."

The Holocaust stands alone in the annals of human history, he said. "It was not just a crime perpetrated against a specific group of people; it was a crime that challenged the fundamental values [that] all civilized peoples hold dear: freedom, democracy, human rights and the rule of law," said Uppal.

The main role of the council –no more than five volunteers are being sought – is to spearhead a fundraising campaign. The government of Canada will match funds raised to cover the cost of the planning, construction and maintenance of the monument.

Candidates, who should submit a curriculum vitae and covering letter to www.NHM-MNH@international.gc.ca before Sept. 21, must be Canadian citizens, have a strong demonstrated interest in or connection to the Holocaust and possess experience in large-scale fundraising and managing a fundraising campaign.

Dogs put nose to job of fighting cancer

Research has shown they can smell disease in humans

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Veterinary student and Toronto native Rachel Wallach said now that studies have proven that dogs can smell cancer in humans, scientists should switch their focus to putting the discovery into practice.

"All the research has gone into 'Can they?' The answer is yes. They can absolutely smell these disease markers," said Wallach, an Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto graduate and third-year University of Glasgow veterinary student.

Rachel Wallach with one of her many animal friends

A study carried out by German researchers and published in the European Respiratory Journal last month showed that dogs were able to detect lung tumours in 71 per cent of patients.

Wallach explained that the researchers trained dogs to detect "volatile organic compounds," which are linked to the presence of cancer, using their keen sense of smell.

"There is actually no human contact with the dogs... Patients who had lung cancer [as well as] patients from a control group who were healthy had to breathe into a tube with a cotton swab at the bottom and then it was sealed," Wallach explained.

"Dogs were trained to positively ID based on reward, the ones with cancer. After they were put through rigorous training protocol, they were given a blind sample and it was a double blind, so even the handler didn't know which were positive and which were negative."

The results from this study showed the dogs identified 71 lung cancer samples out of 100.

"Now that we know that they can, how do we move forward and use it to our advantage?" she asked.

Wallach, who spent her summer in Toronto and has been doing clinical rotations at several practices in the city, said she became "fascinated" with the work being done in this field.

"There is something magical about the fact that dogs can do that."

After learning about a summer research program offered by her school, Wallach obtained a grant to do a literature review on cancer-sniffing dogs.

"In the last decade or so, there has been research about whether dogs can smell disease. Whether it is cancer or diabetes or even parasitic infections," she said.

But Wallach added that despite the number of similar studies, there is no consistent training method for the dogs.

"There is no system that exists in the research sector. There is no protocol on how to train these dogs. I think in order for the research to continue, you have to have a base method of training and evaluation. If you evaluate one way and another lab evaluates another way, you're comparing apples to oranges," Wallach said.

"What I'm looking to do is compare the dogs that have been trained for these projects with the dogs that have been trained... [to detect] explosives and drugs. I'm comparing the ways in which these dogs have been trained and used and evaluated."

She said she is also polling opinions about the studies because many researchers say that although the results are remarkable, they don't see how these dogs can be used in practice.

But if researchers can find a way to put this theory into practice, the method could serve as a way to detect cancer earlier than some medical tests can.

"The dogs are so amazing at early diagnosis that they are able to detect it before a patient even has symptoms or before a doctor even says 'I think I'd like to test for something.'"

Wallach said that in one of the first cancer-sniffing dog studies, dogs were trained to detect prostate cancer in patients' urine.

"All but four dogs kept identifying this one urine sample from a control patient who was supposed to be a healthy patient. So the researches were concerned enough to let the person know. Further tests were done and it turned out that the person had a kidney tumour."

She said a similar story involving the recent study had dogs smelling breast samples.

"The dogs kept IDing this one sample of a control patient and it turned out the patient had been in remission from lung cancer," Wallach said.

"When something sets off the dogs' radar I think people have been concerned enough to say, 'OK, let's look into that.'"

GUARANTEED INCOME FOR LIFE

In this time of financial uncertainty, longevity risk - the risk of outliving your savings – is a real problem. Advances in healthcare and disease prevention have greatly extended our retirement years, yet our level of savings has not kept pace. An annuity is the only investment product that guarantees you income for the rest of your life or the life of you and your spouse. It provides you with the peace of mind that you will never outlive your savings.

Traditional Life Annuities

Traditional life annuities enhance your income and guarantee you a fixed income for life.

Because annuity income is made up of the return of invested principal and the interest it has earned, it is significantly better than interest only generated from GIC investments. Let's compare the annual income on a traditional $200,000 annuity for a male, age 70, in a 43% marginal tax bracket.*

	GIC	Annuity
Investment	$200,000	$200,000
Annual Income	6,000	17,602
Taxable Portion	6,000	3,067
Net Annual Income	3,420	16,283
Gross Yield Equivalent	3.00%	14.28%

Insured Life Annuities

An insured life annuity preserves 100% of your invested capital for your estate.

Combining a traditional life annuity with life insurance ensures 100% return of capital when you die. Consider the following example, which compares the investment of $200,000 in a GIC at 3.00% to an Insured Annuity for a male non-smoker age 70.*

	GIC	Annuity
Investment	$200,000	$200,000
Annual Income	6,000	17,602
Taxable Portion	6,000	3,067
Tax (43%)	2,580	1,319
Insurance Cost	NIL	8,848
Net Annual Income	3,420	7,435
Gross Equivalent Yield	3.00%	6.52%
Estate Value	$200,000	$200,000
Subject to Probate	Yes	No

Variable Annuities

Some variable annuities with a GMWB (Guaranteed Minimum Withdrawal Benefit) provide you with predictable, sustainable, and potentially increasing income for life.

Unlike traditional life annuities you retain ownership and control of your capital investment, you decide which funds your contract invests in, and you decide the age to start your income. And unlike insured life annuities, there are no medicals required. Variable annuities with a GMWB guarantee a minimum income for life independent of the performance of your investments. Also, if your investments perform well your guaranteed income can potentially increase.

Let's look at $200,000 invested at age 50 and the minimum starting income that could be guaranteed at various ages and fund returns by a variable annuity with a GMWB:

	Minimum Annual Guaranteed Income
Age income starts	0% rate of return or less (guaranteed minimum income)	4.5% annual rate of return	7.0% annual rate of return
55	$10,000 for life	$10,095 for life	$10,571 for life
65	$ 17,500 for life	$19,485 for life	$25,017 for life
75	$27,000 for life	$35,356 for life	$ 54,645 for life

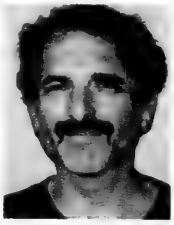
Canadian docs to visit Israel

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Family physician Larry Barzelai has long been fascinated with Israel, but after the 61-year-old read Start-up Nation: The Story of Israel's Economic Miracle and learned of some of the state's innovative high-tech achievements, he knew he needed to visit.



Dr. Larry Barzelai

When the Vancouver doctor dug further, he discovered there were Start-Up Nation tours to Israel where participants could visit the high-tech companies profiled in the book. But Barzelai wanted a tour that focused specifically on the medical research. He inquired, and the travel agency that created these specialized itineraries agreed to collaborate with him to create one.

Fast forward six months to August 2011 and Barzelai has assembled a week-long trip that gives interested physicians at least 15 hours of credits in continuing medical education, as well as visits to medical high-tech companies and the opportunity to learn about the work of doctors on the cutting edge of medicine.

The sessions will include Amir Amedi of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem speaking to the Canadians about blind people being able to "see" via sophisticated sound techniques, while Joseph Yanai, also from Hebrew U., will discuss his stem cell therapy to reduce birth defects in animals. Hossam Haick from the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology will be speaking on the diagnosis of specific cancers from breath samples, and Moshe Shoham will talk about the ViRob robot that can deliver drugs directly to tumours.

"It's been a lot of work getting the trip organized, but it's interesting stuff," Barzelai said. "For me, the highlight will be showing Canadian doctors what incredible medical technological innovations are happening in Israel. The more I read about this stuff, the more it blows me away. I'm also planning to invite Israeli physicians to come too, so there will be some opportunity for mingling."

The medical trip to Israel is scheduled for Nov. 14 to 21, and its cost of $2,198 includes hotels, most meals, educational sessions, tours and travel within Israel. There's space for up to 20 participants. Barzelai had 10 confirmed at time of publication. For more information, contact Barzelai at 604-734-1443 or by e-mail at barzelai@interchange.ubc.ca or bill@keshetisrael.co.il.

Israel's medical advances

Reading Start-up Nation: The Story of Israel's Economic Miracle by Dan Senor and Saul Singer was a revelation. The book describes the story behind Israel's innovative scientific and technological achievements.

The authors start by describing an upcoming electric car battery replacement system. Better Place, a company that works on sustainable transportation options, is expected to start selling batteries for the Renault Fluence ZE this summer. This electric car will be plugged into the electrical grid for overnight charging. For longer distances, it will be necessary to go to a "charging station" that will replace the car's electric battery in less time than a conventional fill-up would take. Senor and Singer describe many other Israeli achievements and provide explanations as to their success.

For the full story describing some of the technical innovations described in the book, please go to cjnews.com.

Holiday Food Ideas

Menus begin with tradition

As the days become shorter and September approaches, Jews everywhere begin to anticipate the High Holidays, which begin with Rosh Hashanah and culminate with Shmini Atzeret and Simchat Torah.

While it is a time for us to think back on the past year and repent for our sins, we also look forward and start the new year with joy and hope.

Rosh Hashanah is ripe with traditions, many of them revolving around food. Although different communities have different customs, most of us prepare sweet foods to symbolize our hopes for a sweet year, and avoid bitter foods such as nuts and horseradish to prevent a bitter year.

In addition to dipping apples in honey, we add fruit to our chicken – often pomegranates whose 613 seeds represent the 613 mitzvot – and raisins to our challah, which, for this holiday, is round, to symbolize our wish for a well-rounded and full year.

Planning menus for the holiday is usually done with these traditions in mind. Some families prepare what their mothers and grandmothers prepared before them, while others seek new recipes that incorporate old traditions.

In the upcoming holiday food supplements, our writers share some of their own family favourites, often with innovative twists.

Whether you are looking for ideas, or just want to know what others are preparing this year, you are sure to come away with something new.

From all of us at The CJN, we wish you happy cooking and, most of all, a Shanah Tovah.

Awesome apple cakes

Daphna Rabinovitch
Special to The CJN

Gastronomically speaking, it's fitting that Rosh Hashanah falls at the end of September this year. We've had time to say our sad farewells to all the summer fruits that have graced our table and our quick-to-put-together desserts.

As summer fades into the background and the days grow slightly shorter, apples come into their own – lip-smacking crisp like the air, hardy like the weather and deliciously sweet, with a sweetness that we hope, as we manipulate these beauties into slices, crumbles and luscious cakes for our Rosh Hashanah dinners, will augur well for the coming year.

For the scrumptious cake recipes that follow, use an apple that will hold its shape during baking, such as Northen Spy, Golden Delicious, Granny Smith or Red Prince.

Preheat oven to 350. Grease 9x3-in. cake pan; line bottom with round of parchment paper.

In saucepan, stir together sugar and 1/2 cup water over medium heat, until dissolved. Increase heat to high and boil, without stirring, until golden, 8 to 10 minutes. Brush down sides of pan with brush dipped in cold water periodically. Remove from heat. Averting face, whisk in butter and cream until butter is melted and foam has subsided. Pour over prepared pan. Arrange apple slices in concentric circles over caramel.

In large bowl, beat butter until light. Gradually beat in sugar until light and fluffy. One at a time, beat in eggs, beating well after each addition.

In another bowl, combine flour, baking powder, baking soda and salt. Stir this into butter mixture alternately with sour cream, making three additions of dry ingredients and two of wet. Scrape it over apples; spread carefully with knife.

Bake in centre of preheated oven for about 45 minutes or until golden brown and centre springs back when lightly pressed. Cool on rack for 10 minutes. Run knife around edge of cake pan. Carefully invert onto cake platter. Serve warm or at room temperature. Makes 12 servings.

APPLE CREAM CHEESE CAKE

This beautiful cake is perfect for a Rosh Hashanah luncheon. The addition of raspberries livens up its colour and the tang of the berries acts as a delicious foil for the sweetness of the apples and the layer of cream cheese. Although a bit lengthy, the cake goes together beautifully and can be made up to a day ahead with exceptional results.

Cake:
1/3 cup unsalted butter, softened
2/3 cup granulated sugar
2 eggs
2 tsp. vanilla
1 1/2 cups all purpose flour
1 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. baking soda
1/4 tsp. salt
1/2 cup yogurt or sour cream
3 apples, peeled, cored and chopped
2 tsp. lemon juice
1/2 tsp. cinnamon
1 cup fresh raspberries
Crumb topping:
1 cup all purpose flour
1/3 cup packed brown sugar
2 tbsp. granulated sugar
1/3 cup butter, melted
Cream cheese filling:
1 pkg. (8 oz.) cream cheese, softened
1/4 cup granulated sugar
1 egg
2 tsp. lemon juice

Grease a 9-in. springform pan and set aside.

To make the crumb topping, combine flour, brown and granulated sugar in a bowl. Drizzle butter over, tossing with fork until crumbly; set aside.

Beat cream cheese in electric mixer until softened. Beat in sugar. Beat in egg, scraping sides. Beat in lemon juice.

Dessert feeds a crowd

In small bowl, toss apples with cinnamon and lemon juice; set aside.

Using electric mixer, beat butter. Gradually beat in sugar until light and fluffy. One at a time, beat in eggs, beating well after each addition. Beat in vanilla.

In separate bowl, combine flour, baking powder, soda and salt. Using wooden spoon, stir flour mixture into butter mixture alternately with yogurt, beginning and ending with flour mixture. Scrape mixture into prepared pan. Scatter half of apples and half of raspberries over batter. Spread with cream cheese mixture. Top with remaining apples and raspberries. Sprinkle evenly with crumb topping.

Bake in centre of preheated oven for 70 to 75 minutes or until cake tester comes out clean and crumb topping is golden. Let cool in pan on rack for 30 minutes. Serve warm or at room temperature. Makes 12 servings.

CRUMBLE-TOPPED SLAB APPLE PIE

If you're having a crowd for Rosh Hashanah, then this is the dessert for you. The pastry is simplicity itself, and you don't have to worry about rolling out a top crust of pastry or that inevitable hollow between a top crust and the pie filling itself. The cranberries offer a welcome splash of colour but the pie is also fabulous without them.

Pastry:
2 1/4 cups all purpose flour
2 tbsp. granulated sugar
1/2 tsp. salt
2/3 cup cold hard margarine or unsalted butter
1/2 cup (approx.) cold water
Apple filling:
3 1/2 lb. apples, peeled, cored and sliced (about 8 apples)
1 cup cranberries (optional)
2/3 cup granulated sugar
1/3 cup all purpose flour
1 tsp cinnamon
2 tbsp. lemon juice
Crumble topping:
1 cup quick cooking oats
1 cup packed brown sugar
3/4 cup all-purpose flour
1/2 cup hard margarine or butter
1/2 cup coarsely chopped pecans or walnuts

In bowl of food processor, combine flour, sugar and salt. Pulse to combine. Cut in cold butter and pulse until mixture resembles coarse crumbs with a few larger pieces of margarine. Drizzle 3/4 of the water over. Pulse until mixture starts to come together, adding just enough water to keep moistened. Do not process until it forms a ball. Dump pastry onto work surface; gently bring together into a disc. Wrap in plastic wrap and refrigerate for 30 minutes or for up to 24 hours.

To make topping, combine oats, brown sugar and flour in a large bowl. Cut in butter until mixture is crumbly. Stir in pecans; set aside.

To make pie, toss together apples, cranberries (if using), sugar, flour, cinnamon and lemon juice in a separate bowl.

Preheat oven to 375. On floured surface, roll out pastry to 18x12-in. rectangle. Wrap pastry around rolling pin and unroll onto 15x10x1-inch baking pan. Flute sides. Scrape apple mixture onto pan spreading evenly. Sprinkle crumb topping evenly over.

Bake in centre of preheated oven for 40 to 45 minutes or until pastry is golden, juices are bubbling and apples are tender. Makes 24 servings.

A holiday handbook: write it down and delegate

Randy Fingrut
Special to The CJN

Wish me a Mazel Tov! My eldest son is getting married.

We are so looking forward to all the festivities, except for one little thing. My son's wedding is right before Rosh Hashanah, and I always host a big crowd on the first night. When I am entertaining, I want everything to be perfect, but I don't want to have to work so hard that I will be stressed and exhausted by the time my guests arrive.

There is so much to consider when preparing for a holiday: menu planning, scheduling, shopping, food preparation, cooking and setting the table. Therefore, it was essential for me to develop a holiday handbook. There are two simple steps to follow: one, write it all down, and two, delegate! Make a to-do list and follow it, and make a guest list so you have a count. Then decide what you are going to serve. Enlist your family to contribute a side dish or a dessert.

Next, make your shopping list. Remember to consider the number of people coming for dinner before deciding on the amount of food to buy. Clean out an area in your refrigerator to keep your holiday food. Whatever can be made in advance should be prepared and frozen.

So, on the morning of, take your soup and your apple cake out of the freezer, and that leaves only a few courses to prepare, a salad, a poultry dish and a side dish. Now you are ready for the big day.

Quick but traditional holiday meal

BARBECUED CHICKEN SOUP

This soup is easy to prepare, and extremely tasty. Make it ahead and freeze.

1 whole deli-style barbecued chicken
4 large carrots, peeled
4 large celery ribs
1 large cooking onion
2 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. pepper
large Dutch oven or stock pot that holds 8 quarts of water

Cover the barbecued chicken, carrots, celery and onion with water reaching 2 inches from the top of the pot. Bring pot to a boil and skim any fat that may appear. Add more water, if necessary, to keep level 2 inches from the top of the pot. Reduce heat to a simmer, cover pot and cook for 1 1/2 hours. Remove the vegetables and discard. Remove the chicken, which can be deboned when cooled. It makes wonderful chicken salad or goes great in pasta sauce. Freeze the soup and the deboned chicken in separate containers for future use.

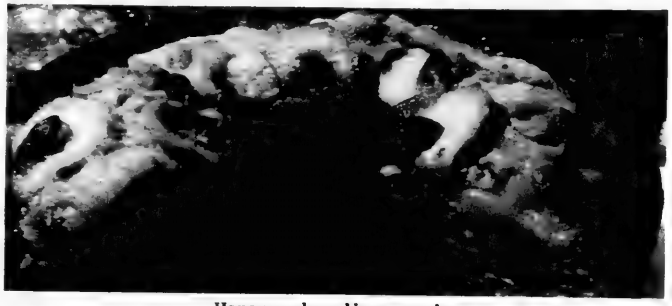
SESAME CHICKEN

Crispy, moist and mouth-watering, this chicken dish will be a big hit.

6 boneless chicken breasts, fat and skin removed
1/2 cup all purpose flour
5 oz. sesame seeds
1 tbsp. paprika
1 1/2 tsp. salt
1 egg
1 cup chicken stock
3-4 tbsp. canola oil

Set out 3 flat bottomed bowls. In first, mix 1/2 of each of the flour, sesame seeds, paprika and salt, in the second beat the egg and then add it to the stock, in the third mix the remainder of the flour, sesame seeds, paprika and salt. Toss the chicken breasts in the first flour mixture, then coat well with the egg mixture, then coat well in the second flour mixture. Heat the oil in a large pan and fry the chicken just until the coating becomes golden in colour. Spray a baking dish with canola oil and place chicken in the dish and bake at 350 for about 30 minutes or until tender.

Frying the chicken until golden is a step that can be skipped if desired. Instead, bake chicken in a prepared pan at 350 for about 40 minutes. Chicken will turn out less golden and crunchy, but is still delicious.



Honey-apple and banana cake

MOCK POTATO KUGEL

Zucchini makes this dish light and delicious. This combination of potatoes and zucchini does away with the need for another vegetable dish when time is limited.

2 medium zucchini, scrubbed
1 tsp. salt
2 large potatoes, scrubbed
2 tbsp. canola oil, more may be added if necessary
6 green onions, finely chopped
6 cloves of garlic, finely minced
2 tbsp. fresh herbs, finely chopped (thyme, sage, rosemary or tarragon)
1 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. ground pepper

In the processor or by hand, grate the zucchini and place in a colander. Sprinkle with salt and let stand 10 minutes. Squeeze out excess water from zucchini. Grate potatoes, place in colander and rinse well with cold water. Squeeze out water. Blend zucchini and potatoes. In large ovenproof pan, heat oil and add the onion, garlic and herbs. Sauté until onion is soft. Add potato mixture and cook for 10 minutes, stirring occasionally. Add salt and pepper and continue to cook for 10 minutes more. Place pan in the oven under the broiler, until the top of the potato mixture is nicely browned. Season to taste.

HONEY-APPLE AND BANANA CAKE

3 cups all purpose flour
2 cups sugar
1 pinch salt
1 tsp. baking soda
2 tsp. pure vanilla extract
3 eggs
1 cup canola oil
3 bananas
4 large apples thinly sliced
1/2 cup honey
additional honey for drizzling

On a baking sheet covered with parchment paper, arrange the sliced apples and drizzle the honey over them. Bake in a 400-degree oven for 10 minutes, or until the apples are tender. Remove the apples and reduce heat to 350.

In a food processor, mix the oil, eggs and sugar. Mix in vanilla and bananas until smooth. Add in dry ingredients and pulse until combined. Spray a tube pan with canola oil and pour in 1/2 of the batter. Place 1/2 of the apple slices over the batter and pour in the remainder of the batter. Arrange the remainder of the apple slices in an overlapped fashion on the top of the cake. Bake for 35 minutes or until a toothpick comes out clean. Cool slightly and remove from pan. Drizzle more honey over the top of the cake before serving.

After Gadhafi's fall, is Syria's Assad next?

Uriel Heilman
JTA

Analysis

He was the Arab world's most quixotic leader.

During the Reagan era, he was Public Enemy No. 1 in the United States. Later, after his apparent co-operation in dismantling nonconventional weapons, he became an ally to president George W. Bush's administration in the war on terror.

He called for an Israeli-Palestinian confederation called Isratine. He travelled overseas with a coterie of fetching female bodyguards. He slept in an elaborate tent.

Now that Libyan strongman Moammar Gadhafi appears to have been cast into the dustbin of history – he disappeared last week as rebels overtook Tripoli – the question in the Arab world is: who's next?

All eyes are on President Bashar Assad of Syria.

Last month, U.S. President Barack Obama and a host of European leaders called on the Syrian leader to step down. While Assad marshalled tanks and troops and sent them into the streets to face off against anti-government demonstrators, pushing the death toll well into the thousands, the United States and European Union countries clamped down with new sanctions against Damascus. Even the leaders of Turkey, an ally of Syria, have called on Assad to stop the bloodshed.

Bashar Assad

But if you're waiting for the regime in Damascus to disappear, don't hold your breath. Syria is no Libya, and Assad is no Gadhafi.

What's more, Israel may not even want such an outcome.

To be sure, anyone who said a year ago that three Arab dictators would be toppled by popular uprisings in the space of nine months would have been called a naïf.

But that doesn't mean the Arab world is about to birth another fallen dictator.

A few elements make Syria's case different from the uprisings in Libya, Egypt and Tunisia.

For one thing, opposition to Assad has materialized much more slowly, both inside and outside the country. Domestically, anti-government demonstrations have yet to explode into a full-scale armed uprising as they quickly did in Libya and Tunisia. The Assad family long has maintained its iron rule over Syria by stoking the fires of the country's sectarian divisions, and while Assad might be reviled by some in the country, others – including the Alawite community from which he hails – view him as a patron of sorts.

In Egypt, the fall of Hosni Mubarak's regime owed at least as much to the military's decision to side with the people as it did to the protesters themselves. Indeed, for the time being, the uprising there looks more like a military coup than a democratic revolution. In Syria, however, the military remains fiercely loyal to the regime.

Within the Arab world, opposition to Gadhafi's assault against his own people came almost immediately, with the Arab League's endorsement of a NATO-enforced no-fly zone over the country. But it took the same body until last week to demand that Assad end his bloody crackdown, months after it began. And even then, the Arab League's statement fell far short of endorsing military operations, as it did in the case of Libya.

Likewise, it took much longer for western leaders to call for Assad's ouster. And unlike with Libya, so far these leaders have given no real consideration to backing up their talk with air strikes.

Why not?

UN says Gaza blockade legal; Turkey 'punishes' Israel

Jack Khoury and Barak Ravid
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The expulsion of Israel's ambassador over an Israel Defence Forces raid of a Turkish aid flotilla is just one step in many possible measures taken against Israel if it persists in its refusal to apologize for the incident, Turkish President Abdullah Gul said on Friday.

Gul's comments came just hours after Turkish Foreign Minister announced the downscale of diplomatic relations with Jerusalem, saying the move was a direct response to Israel's refusal to apologize for the deaths of nine Turkish nationals in the May 2010 raid.

Turkey has decided to downgrade its diplomatic ties with Israel to the lowest possible level, Turkish Foreign Minister Ahmet Davutoglu said on Friday, following Israel's continued refusal to apologize for a 2010 raid on a Gaza-bound aid flotilla.

The findings of a UN probe into Israel's deadly raid on a 2010 flotilla to Gaza known as the Palmer Commission Report, which were leaked to the New York Times Sept. 2, have further raised tensions between Israel and Turkey, and senior Foreign Ministry officials warned that Turkey could respond to the report's publication by expelling the Israeli ambassador and scaling back diplomatic relations.

Speaking to reporters on Friday, Davutoglu announced the downscale of diplomatic relations with Jerusalem, saying the move was a direct response to Israel's refusal to apologize for the deaths of nine Turkish nationals in the May 2010 raid.

The implications of the downgrade are that the level of diplomatic representation in both countries will be scaled back from ambassador to first secretary. This means Israel's ambassador to Turkey, Gabby Levy, and his deputy, Ella Afek, will be expelled.

A statement by the Turkish Foreign Ministry, published minutes following Davutoglu's press conference, indicated that Turkish and Israeli diplomats due to leave their respective posts as a result of the downgrade will do so by Sept. 7.

"Israel squandered all of the opportunities to end the crisis, and now it must pay for it," Davutoglu said, adding that Turkey's official position was that Israel's blockade on the Gaza Strip was illegal, despite the fact that the UN report supported its legality.

Hinting at the possible consequences of Turkey's disagreement with the UN's interpretation of Israel's blockade, the Turkish FM said that Ankara would "do whatever it takes to implement its interpretation of the significance of international waters in the Mediterranean.

"We cannot accept the blockade on Gaza. We cannot say that the blockade aligns with international law," he said, adding that the stance taken by the Palmer Commission Report was the author's "personal opinion, one which does not correspond with Turkey's position."

Additionally, Davutoglu announced the cancellation of all defence contracts between Israel and Turkey, adding that Ankara would both initiaite legal action against the Gaza blockade in international courts, as well as aid families of those killed in the Gaza flotilla raid in seeking litigation against Israel.

Warning of the possible consequences of Israel's refusal to apologize for the flotilla raid, Davutoglu said that Friday's official release of the Palmer Report constituted Israel's last chance to apologize for its raid on the Turkish-sponsored flotilla and warned of consequences, including sanctions, should Israel continue to refuse to apologize.

Unless there is an Israeli apology, "we will put Plan B into play," Davutoglu said. He said Turkey intended to impose sanctions, "which both Israel and other international parties are aware of."

Referring to Israel's request for another delay in the report's publication, he said that Ankara "cannot accept another six-month extension."

Turkish President Abdullah Gul

Senior Israeli officials said that Israel would not apologize for the raid and that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu had reiterated this to the U.S. administration in the past few days.

Turkey is also planning a diplomatic and legal campaign against Israel in the United Nations, and will help the families of those killed and injured in the raid to file lawsuits against Israel in courts worldwide.

In addition, Ankara is threatening to halt trade between Turkey and Israel, which totals billions of dollars.

The United Nations Palmer Report on the May 31 2010 Flotilla Incident, to have been published officially Sept. 2, found that the Israeli commandos who boarded the Mavi Marmara on route to the Gaza Strip were met with "organized and violent resistance from a group of passengers," and so were "forced to use self defence." Nine Turkish activists died aboard the ship.

Nevertheless, the report – obtained and published Sept. 1 by New York Times – found that the Israeli forces used "excessive and unreasonable force," and emphasized that the loss of life on board the ship is "unacceptable." Moreover, it found that the treatment of the passengers by the IDF soldiers after the interception was "abusive."

The Palmer report determined that the Israeli naval blockade on the Gaza Strip is legal, as "Israel faces a security threat from violent groups in Gaza."

The report harshly criticizes the flotilla organizers, stating, "they acted recklessly in attempting to breach the naval blockade". It added that "there exist serious questions about the conduct, true nature and objectives of the flotilla organizers, particularly IHH." The report claimed that the Turkish government tried to persuade the organizers not to sail toward Gaza, "but could have done more." The interception method employed by Israel also comes under attack in the report, which claims that Israel could have acted non-violently at first and should have warned the passengers of an imminent military operation.

Iran uses Arab Spring to accelerate nuclear program

Yossi Melman
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The unrest and uprisings in the Arab world are distracting the international community from Iran's nuclear program, and Iran is taking advantage of the situation to accelerate its efforts.

The head of Iran's atomic energy agency, Fereydoun Abbasi Davani, announced this week that his country would continue to enrich uranium. He said enrichment would be done at both the country's facilities: to 3.5 percent at Natanz to produce fuel for nuclear reactors that would produce electricity, and to 20 per cent at the fortified underground facility near Qom, intended for the research reactor in Tehran to produce isotopes for medicinal purposes.

The attempts to disrupt Iran's nuclear program by the West's leading intelligence agencies are diversifying. Alongside the diplomatic pressure and economic sanctions (which are not particularly effective), several violent operations have been carried out against Iran in recent years. Shell companies and fronts set up by western intelligence agencies have sold flawed material to Iran. In operations attributed to the Mossad and CIA, the Stuxnext worm was planted in Natanz's computers that operate uranium-enriching centrifuges, shutting down more than 1,000 of the machines.

Since 2007, there have been five assassination attempts on the lives of Iranian nuclear scientists. Four were killed and Abbasi Davani was wounded. Yet it seems Iran is as determined to carry on as its rivals are. The remarks by the Iranian atomic energy agency's head are seen as a warning to the international community. They come against the backdrop of worrisome reports about increasing co-operation between Iran and North Korea.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

The German daily Suddeutsche Zeitung, which has published several articles on these developments based on intelligence sources proven to be reliable, reported a few days ago that North Korea has supplied Iran with a highly precise computer to help simulate a nuclear explosion. According to the report, supported by "western" intelligence agencies (a code word that could refer to Germany's BND intelligence agency or even the Mossad), the computer transfer is part of a larger $100-million deal between Tehran and Pyongyang. The broader deal also includes teaching and training Iranian experts in nuclear weapons and missiles.

There are various predictions about when Iran will be able to make its first nuclear bombs. The previous Mossad chief, Meir Dagan, estimated that it would happen in 2014-15, similar to the assessment by American intelligence. Others say Iran will prefer not to put together any bombs at all and keep the option open to easily assemble a bomb. In any case, even if Iran does build nuclear weapons, it will face a dilemma over whether to announce this or maintain a policy of "nuclear ambiguity" like Israel.

Western diplomats have expressed suspicion over a recent Iranian effort to show rare openness about its disputed nuclear program, calling it just a "charm offensive."

Diplomats said they believed the UN nuclear watchdog would once again highlight concern about possible military aspects to Iran's nuclear activities in its latest quarterly report, due to be submitted to member states in the next few days.

"I expect it will be a bit tougher than the last one. Still a number of outstanding matters related to PMD [possible military dimensions] that Iran refuses to answer," a western envoy told Reuters last Thursday. Another diplomat painted a similar picture, saying Tehran had failed to address the IAEA's core concerns. Western nations suspect Iran is trying to use its nuclear program to develop atomic weapons. The Islamic Republic has denied the charge, saying it wants to produce nuclear energy.

Anxiety over post-Assad Syria

For one thing, it wouldn't look good for the United States to be involved in four wars in Muslim countries. And unlike with Libya, neither the Syrian opposition nor the Arab League has asked western powers to intervene.

Perhaps most notably, there is great anxiety in the Middle East and around the world about what a post-Assad Syria might look like.

That's not to say that either the Americans or Israelis have any affection for Assad, but the instability that doubtless would follow his ouster could prove complicated for a whole host of neighbours.

Israel already is dealing with instability on its borders with Gaza and Egypt, and its frontier with Syria has been at its quietest over the course of nearly four decades – at least, until the protests in Syria began. Change, in Israel's view, is an unknown and therefore a frightening prospect.

To its west, Syria traditionally has played the role of patron and overlord to Lebanon. Assad's ouster could strengthen Hezbollah, or even throw Lebanon into complete disarray.

Perhaps most worrisome, a vacuum of power in Syria could be filled by nearby Iran.

For the time being, it seems that so long as the West declines to take up arms, it will be up to the Syrian people to get rid of their leader. Unlike with Egypt, a recipient of U.S. aid and a subject of U.S. influence, Syria long has been a pariah state and has minimal ties with the United States. It cannot be subject to the same kind of moderating pressure that was applied in Egypt.

All this doesn't mean that Assad will stick around forever. If the last few months have taught us anything, it's to expect the unexpected in the Middle East.

But if Assad is to go, it looks like nothing short of a war will convince him.

Art patron supported Canadian, Israeli galleries

JERUSALEM — Ayala Zacks Abramov, a collector of modern and Israeli art who gave scores of works to museums in Israel and Canada, died Aug. 29 at age 99 in Tel Aviv.

Zacks Abramov collected works by Delacroix, Corot, Pissarro, Gauguin, Rodin, Picasso, Matisse, Kandinsky, Chagall, Paul Klee and Giacometti. She collected the works of Israeli artists such as classic painters Marcel Janco, Mordecai Ardon, Reuven Rubin and Anna Ticho, as well as contemporary Israelis Ofer Lalush, Liliane Klapisch, Yigal Tumarkin and Joseph Zaritsky.

Obituary

The Jerusalem Post described Zacks Abramov as "arguably Israel's greatest art collector" and compared her to the famed American art collector and patron Peggy Guggenheim.

"In contrast to [Isabella Stewart] Gardner and [Henry Clay] Frick, who specialized in old masters, she bought works by 20th-century artists during their lifetimes and also developed personal relationships with them," said Doron Luria of the Tel Aviv Museum of Art. "This is the difference between a historical collector and a collector who buys what they love."

Luria said Zacks Abramov was "an unforgettable woman who goes around with a little lap dog ... more like a patroness from the House of Medici who would arrive at da Vinci's studio and ask him what was new. This is a breed of collector that has vanished from the world, and there is nothing like it today."

The Israel Museum honoured her on her 80th birthday with a special exhibit from her collection. Museum director James Snyder said that Zacks Abramov was "one of the most important patrons of modern art in the world, and one of the greatest patrons and most devoted supporters of modern Israeli art."

The Tel Aviv and Israel museums were named in her will.

Toronto's York University has the Samuel J. Zacks Art Gallery, named for her second husband, a successful businessman and artist.

Zacks Abramov, whose full name was Ayala Ben Tovim Fleg Zacks Abramov, was born in Jerusalem to one of the city's most well-known and well-to-do families. She was educated in pre-state Palestine, London and Paris, where she married her first husband, Maurice Fleg. She joined the French Resistance after Fleg was killed in action in 1940. She married Samuel Zacks, a Canadian financier, Zionist and art collector, in 1947.

They collected art of the School of Paris, which included many Jewish artists such as Mane-Katz, Soutine, Chagall, Jules Pascin and Camille Pissaro, as well as Canadian and Israeli art and antiquities. In 1956 they gave a collection of Canadian art to Queen's University. Other Canadian museums that received gifts included the Royal Ontario Museum and the Art Gallery of Ontario. The couple's gifts formed the basis of the AGO's modern European art collection.

Zacks Abramov continued to live in Canada after Zacks died in 1970. She returned to Israel following her 1976 marriage to Minsk-born Zalman Abramov, an international lawyer and politician, who was a Likud member of Knesset from 1959 to 1977. Together they continued their art patronage, and she maintained the efforts following his death in 1997.

More illegal migrants

A record 2,000 people managed to illegally cross the border from Egypt into Israel last month, according to the Population Authority. Most came from Africa, while others came from Turkey and China. Infiltrators who were caught were taken to a Negev detention centre, but the Population Authority said 10 to 15 per cent of the infiltrators managed to elude the army and were able reach various cities in Israel. Some 300 people reportedly made it to Tel Aviv last month without encountering security forces. The Israel Defence Forces has beefed up its presence on the Egyptian border after the mid-August terror attack near Eilat. Nevertheless, some 100 infiltrators are said to be able to enter Israel in a 24-hour period.

Post fires reporter

The Jerusalem Post fired senior reporter Larry Derfner after he penned a controversial blog post justifying terror attacks against Israelis. The post, titled "The awful, necessary truth about Palestinian terror," appeared on a personal blog Derfner shares, Israel Reconsidered (Israelleft.com). It caused a storm of controversy for appearing to justify the recent terror attack near Eilat, which killed eight Israelis. It was later deleted from the blog. "Whoever the Palestinians were who killed the eight Israelis near Eilat last week, however vile the ideology was, they were justified to attack," Derfner wrote. He apologized, saying he meant the Israeli occupation provokes Palestinian terror, not justifies it. He later posted that the paper fired him after hundreds of subscribers cancelled.

Flag flies again

The Israeli flag is flying again over the country's embassy in Cairo more than a week after protesters tore it down. The flag was replaced Aug. 29 and is flying alongside an Egyptian flag that had been placed there in its absence, Ynet reported. Egyptian protester Ahmad Shahat climbed up the side of the 22-storey building to cheers from anti-Israel protesters and ripped down the flag, two days after five Egyptian border guards died in fighting between Israeli troops and terrorists following a co-ordinated attack on civilian vehicles near Eilat. Shahat, dubbed "Flagman," was reportedly given a new home and a new job by an Egyptian provincial governor. Israeli officials have apologized for the accidental killing of the Egyptian troops, but Egypt has said the apology is not enough.

Aroma launches seventh café, eighth soon to follow

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

During one of my early visits to Israel in the 1970s, it seemed the only kind of coffee you could get in a restaurant was "café nes."

It sounded pretty good, at least the first time – "miracle coffee." Oops. My mistake. It turned out it was nothing more than Nescafe, an instant coffee.

At breakfast, some of the finer establishments served "café filter," which was presented as it sounds, with the filter and grounds still atop the cup. A better brew, for sure, but try ordering it at lunch or, heaven forbid, at dinner. "You'll have to speak to the manager," was the reply on at least one occasion from a startled waitress.

My how things have changed. Today, Canada, which at the time wasn't much ahead of Israel when it came to a fine coffee brew, is importing Israeli coffee culture. To date, seven Aroma Espresso Bars have opened in the Greater Toronto Area, with an eighth slated to launch in the near future in Forest Hill Village.

Last week, Aroma celebrated its seventh restaurant in the Shops at Don Mills with an official launch.

Prior to the launch, at mid-day, the restaurant was bustling. According to Anat Davidzon, managing partner for Aroma Espresso Bar Canada, the chain has been going great guns since it opened here in 2006.

"It's well received," she said. "Our customers really appreciate what we do with the brand."

"It's different from what they're used to with other businesses... People often refer to Aroma with the word, 'love. We love the brand.'"

So what is it about Aroma that apparently attracts such a devoted clientele? After all, Aroma is hardly alone in the marketplace for premium coffees. Starbucks, Timothy's and Second Cup are no slouches in that market segment.

Coffee is only part of the attraction, Davidzon, a native of Ra'anana, explained. The coffees are blended and roasted in Israel and shipped to restaurants in Canada. Then they're brewed for customers by barristas who use "traditional espresso machines, not automatic ones. Our barristas needs to be very skilled before you get that cup of coffee. They control the thickness of the grind... when they brew each cup."

The food is the other distinctive element in the restaurants, she continued.

As David Nadler, the Don Mills franchise owner, explained, breads are baked fresh daily on the premises.

The baked goods are shipped frozen from Israel, he continued. The sandwiches and other menu items are made fresh to order and are not pre-packaged.

Adding to the culinary experience is service on china with real cutlery, not the paper cups prevalent in other coffee shops, Davidzon said.

Anat Davidzon

The offerings are pretty similar to what one could find in Israel, with some modifications for the Canadian market. The eggplant-based "Iraqi sandwich" you might order in Tel Aviv is called a "Mediterranean sandwich" in Toronto. And there are a few items not available in Israel, such as a steak sandwich and organic oatmeal.

Put all that together, along with "a sleek décor and a social atmosphere" as well as Wi-Fi connectivity, and the Aroma restaurants are quite distinctive. Sales are split pretty evenly between coffee and food, and revenues run into the seven figures, Davidzon said.

The formula seems to be working. In addition to the Don Mills and Forest Hill restaurants, you can find Aroma outlets at Bathurst and Bloor streets, the first Canadian store, as well as in the Eaton Centre, King and York streets (underground), Yonge Street and Eglinton Avenue, the Promenade Mall and at Rutherford Road and Centre Street in Thornhill.

There are now more than 100 Aroma restaurants around the world – in Israel of course, but also in the United States, Ukraine, Kazakhstan and Romania.

The Canadian cafes are operated as a franchise, with fees ranging from $500,000 to $900,000, depending on size, location and condition of the building and renovations needed. Corporate headquarters receives royalties "like any franchise model," Davidzon said.

The brand is proving so successful, that Davidzon and her partner, Earl Gorman, are expecting to expand to British Columbia and Quebec in the next year or two.

Unemployment down, housing starts up in Israel

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel's unemployment rate continued to decline during the second quarter of 2011, dropping to 5.5 per cent compared to six per cent in the first quarter, the Central Bureau of Statistics (CBS) announced last week.

Finance Minister Yuval Steinitz reacted to the news, stating, "The policy steps we have taken over the past two years continue to show results. The continued historic trend of lowered unemployment is especially striking against the backdrop of the volatility of world markets. The Israeli economy is demonstrating economic stability, and we must maintain it through a responsible budgetary policy, as we have done up to now."

Meanwhile, the CBS reported that construction on 22,000 housing units was begun in the first half of this year, 15 per cent more than the first half of last year.

The south of the country experienced the biggest relative increase – 55 per cent. Rehovot had triple the number of construction starts and Ashkelon double the number compared to the first half of 2010.

The number of housing starts in Tel Aviv increased by 28 per cent to 2,717, while Jerusalem housing construction starts actually declined by eight per cent to 1,300. The capital also experienced a decline of 28 per cent in the number of housing units that were completed in the first half of 2011, to fewer than 1,000 units.

In other developments, the National Infrastructure Ministry hired a consultant to look into the possible construction of a nuclear power plant in Israel, apparently to be built at Shivta in the Negev. The move comes despite the nuclear reactor accident in Japan in March and notwithstanding the major natural gas discoveries off Israel's coast.

The idea of building a nuclear power plant at Shivta had been raised before, but it was promoted recently as a substitute for a proposed Israel Electric Corporation coal-powered plant.

Social inequities preoccupy filmmaker

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

When it comes to her film career, Sarah Goodman is somewhat of a late bloomer. She dabbled in community work and advertising and didn't get into film until she was about 30. However, as a novice filmmaker, Goodman was virtually an overnight success.

Her first film, Army of One, which follows the lives of three young American men who enlist in the army following 9-11, won the 2004 Hot Docs award for best Canadian documentary film. It also garnered Goodman a Gemini nomination for best director.

Her second documentary, When We Were Boys (2009), which focuses on the emotional lives of a group of privileged teenage boys at an elite private school, was a contender for the 2011 Donald Brittain Gemini Award.

Now Goodman, 38, has a new feather in her film cap. Hidden Driveway, her first attempt at directing a fictional film, will have its world première at the Toronto International Film Festival

"Premièring at TIFF is very exciting," Goodman said in a telephone interview, noting that the five-minute short, written by Brad Hart and produced by Avi Federgreen, explores the relationship between two young brothers.

The film, which also screens at the end of September at the Edmonton International Film Festival, is a precursor to Bridging, the full-length feature film she's slated to direct next summer. Hidden Driveway was her first time directing actors, a skill she needed to hone for Bridging, she said.

Sarah Goodman on the set of her film Hidden Driveway.

However, the project still needs some funding. "There's support from Telefilm [Canada], but we're still looking for funders."

Bridging, set in Montreal's downtown chassidic community, centres on a 12-year-old chassidic boy's chance encounter with a gentile teenage girl on the verge of committing suicide. The boy inadvertently saves her life one Shabbat day, when he and his family happen to cross the Jacques Cartier Bridge just as the girl is about to jump off the bridge.

Goodman explained that issues pertaining to youth figure prominently in her work, because her "passion is telling stories about young people."

She grew up in Toronto and studied visual arts at Concordia University, but she was not interested in a career "in the gallery world," she said,

"Gradually, I began thinking about fusing my arts background with what I learned from my parents.

"I was raised with a real social conscience.

"My parents [Mark Goodman, a sociology professor at York University and Ruth Goodman, a senior social worker at Baycrest] gave me an understanding of social inequities. I wanted to be able to tell those stories through an artistic lens."

When Goodman graduated from Concordia, she did community work with gay and lesbian youths in New York. She also put in a four-year stint with a New York ad agency, before making the move to film.

She said she feels "really fortunate" to have gained recognition in documentary filmmaking, a pursuit she'll continue as she ventures into feature dramas. "I will always return to documentaries. It's my creative bread and butter. I love observing real people's lives."

And while doing creative work is very gratifying, Goodman is quick to point out that a career in film is not easy. "There are many day-to-day challenges in being an independent filmmaker, but I can't imagine doing anything else."

Hidden Driveway will be shown at the AMC 6 at 7:15 p.m. on Sept. 10. TIFF public screenings take place at the TIFF Bell Lightbox 4 on Sept. 13 at 12:30 p.m. and on Sept. 17 at 8:45 p.m.

The film is the Polish candidate for the Academy Awards in the category of best foreign film. Director Holland has been nominated twice before for her 1986 film Angry Harvest and the 1992 Europa, Europa. Sony Pictures Classic picked up the film for North American distribution at the Berlin Film Festival earlier this year.

Sassoon revolutionized hairdressing, stylish biopic says

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

With a pair of scissors he changed the way women look.

Inspired by Bauhaus architecture, Vidal Sassoon revolutionized the art of hair styling, creating the now-famous geometric five-point cut, the short, angular bob that requires little maintenance and, he claims, liberated women from "the tyranny of the salon."

"Haircutting is simply design," says Sassoon, a Sephardi Jew who rose from poverty to ownership of an international empire of salons, schools and hair-care products.

Now 83, he is profiled in Michael Gordon's stylish documentary, Vidal Sassoon: The Movie, which was released in DVD form this week.

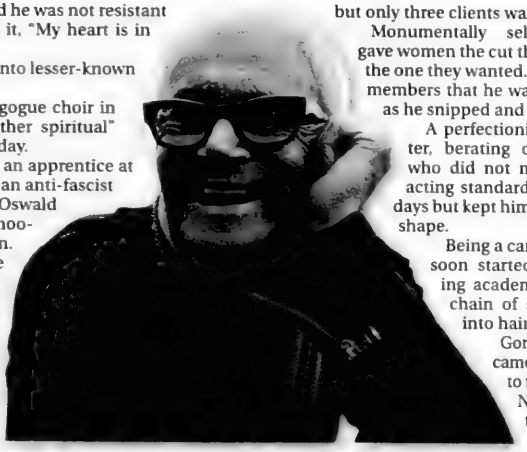
Born in London in 1928, Sassoon had a miserable childhood. His father, Jack, left his wife, Betty, for another woman when Sassoon was only three years old. Being destitute, Betty placed him in an orphanage, where he languished for the next six years.

Dropping out of school at 14, he worked as a shampoo boy, glove cutter and bicycle messenger before turning his hand to hairdressing at his mother's suggestion. She urged him to learn a trade, and he was not resistant to the idea. As he puts it, "My heart is in hair."

The film also delves into lesser-known aspects of his life.

A member of a synagogue choir in his youth, he feels "rather spiritual" when he visits a shul today.

When he was 17 and an apprentice at a salon, Sassoon joined an anti-fascist group that confronted Oswald Mosley's antisemitic hooligans in east London. After the Holocaust, he explains, he could not just sit idly at home when Mosley's gangs were provocatively roaming the streets and shouting vociferously, "We've got to get rid of the Yids."



Vidal Sassoon

Inevitably, brawls broke out and during these fisticuffs Sassoon managed to land some damaging blows. But sometimes, he admits, his opponents got the better of him.

With the first Arab-Israeli war raging, he volunteered to fight for the newly established State of Israel, joining the Palmach in July 1948. He recalls his year in Israel as a "fascinating experience" that shaped his identity as a Jew. But unfortunately, no telling details are provided, a gap that should have been filled.

Returning to London, Sassoon studied hairdressing with Raymond, a noted stylist. "He taught me to cut hair with just a pair of scissors," he says.

A self-made man, Sassoon was animated by a belief that hairdressing was in dire need of change. Women traditionally spent hours in a salon getting their hair styled. Sassoon accelerated the process.

"The old-fashioned methods weren't for me," he observes, adding it took him nine years to perfect his "wash and wear" style.

He opened a small salon on posh Bond Street in 1964, but only three clients walked in on the first day.

Monumentally self-confident, Sassoon gave women the cut they needed rather than the one they wanted. A former colleague remembers that he was a whir of movement as he snipped and snipped.

A perfectionist, he was a taskmaster, berating or sacking employees who did not measure up to his exacting standards. He worked 14-hour days but kept himself in tip-top physical shape.

Being a canny businessman, Sassoon started a line of hairdressing academies before opening a chain of salons and branching into hair-care products.

Gordon suggests that he became a celebrity after moving to the United States, first to New York City and then to Los Angeles, where he lives today.

Though he appears to have had something of a charmed life since his career took off and soared, he has tasted disappointment and tragedy.

Several marriages have soured, and his older daughter, Catya, died of a drug overdose at 33.

Vidal Sassoon: The Movie bogs down in a tangle of superfluous detail in its final 30 minutes, but on balance, it is an intriguing biopic and is fun and enlightening to watch.

Madoff doc delves into Ponzi scam

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Fraudster extraordinaire Bernard Madoff, who bilked clients out of $50 billion in the biggest Ponzi scheme in history, is the subject of Jeff Prosserman's absorbing documentary, Chasing Madoff.

Now playing in Toronto, it's a cautionary tale rather than a biopic. Instead of focusing on fine biographical details, Prosserman concentrates on the grand and breathtaking scale of Madoff's duplicity.

Madoff seemed like a reliable money manager, promising clients he would safeguard their funds. They collected reasonably high returns, feeding the myth that Madoff was something of a genius.

As word of his acumen spread, he turned away potential clients by the droves. Little did they know that Madoff was a liar and a thief. The aura of perfection and invincibility he had concocted about himself seemed unassailable.

If Madoff is the villain in this film, an investment analyst named Harry Markopolos is surely the hero. Having crunched the numbers, he smelled a rat.

"The figures were too good to be true," said Markopolos, a consummate whistleblower. And he was right.

But according to Chasing Madoff, the Securities and Exchange Commission – the federal body that is supposed to regulate financial transactions in the United States – ignored Markopolos' warnings of impropriety.

Markopolos sent incriminating material to Forbes magazine, but it chose not to run an expose.

So how was Madoff finally brought down?

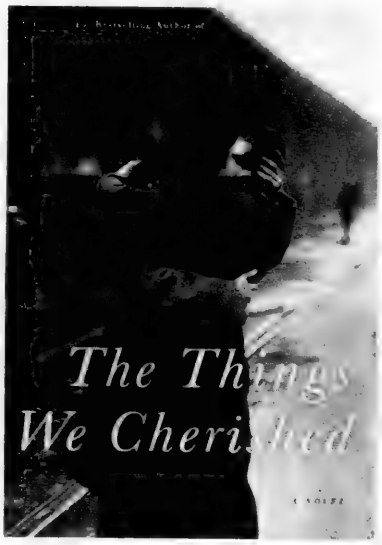
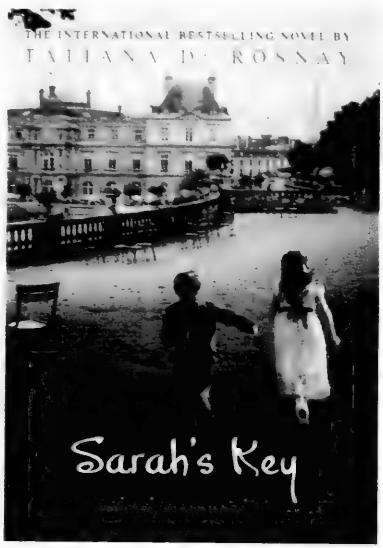
Romance/thriller leaves reader wanting more

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor





The Things We Cherished (Doubleday) by Pam Jenoff is a romance/thriller that features Nazis, Righteous Gentiles, a war crimes trial, sibling rivalry, love triangles and a custom-made clock that seemingly links them all together.

Charlotte Gold is a public defender in present-day Philadelphia, the daughter of Holocaust survivors. One day, she is surprised to see her ex-boyfriend, Brian Warrington, in her office. Charlotte still hasn't gotten over Brian, also a lawyer, whom she hasn't heard from in several years.

Brian wants her to help him with a client of his, Roger Dykmans, a wealthy businessman who is being tried for war crimes for turning his brother Hans over to the Nazis, 50 years ago. At the time, his brother was a diplomat for the German foreign office who had been secretly using his connections to save Jews in Raoul Wallenberg fashion.

Brian believes his client, though somewhat reluctant to co-operate, is innocent, but time is short before the trial begins. Charlotte – somewhat unbelievably – agrees to drop everything and fly off to Germany, where she discovers that Brian's estranged brother, Jack, is also helping out.

The wartime relationship between Roger and Hans parallels the present relationship between Brian and Jack – a bit too obviously – and is revealed through a series of flashbacks throughout the novel.

During the war, Roger roomed with his brother and his brother's wife, Magda, in Breslau while he went to university there. With Hans frequently away on diplomatic duties, Roger found himself alone with Magda, and the two fell in love.

In the present day, Charlotte finds herself working closely with Jack, and learns that the way Brian treated her is one of the reasons for the rift between the brothers. Inevitably, Charlotte finds herself falling for Jack just as Brian flies to Europe to check on their progress.

In his prison cell, Roger admits to his lawyers that he had a clandestine relationship with his brother's wife, but denies handing him over to the Nazis. He says there is proof of his innocence hidden in the base of an old anniversary clock.

The clock is used as a literary device that follows the narrative around as it is passed through various hands over the decades.

We are introduced to the clock early in the novel, in a moving flashback to 1903 Bavaria. In the midst of antisemitic pogroms, a farmer, worried about his pregnant wife, wishes to escape to America. To finance their trip, he spends his nights crafting this beautiful clock, in order to sell it to a businessman.

The problem with The Things We Cherished is that while it's interesting enough, its key revelations and plot twists don't come as much of a surprise and the ending is very anticlimactic.

And some of the events seem too contrived to be believed.

When, for instance, Roger tells Charlotte that he isn't sure if Magda survived the war, Charlotte is able to learn the truth with a simple phone call to the right person.

One wonders why Roger, a wealthy man with vast resources, couldn't figure out how to do this himself – he's had 50 years of fruitless searching.

Jenoff, whose debut novel The Kommandant's Girl was a Quill Award finalist, has written an enjoyable page-turner, but I felt that when I was done, I needed something more.

So, after that, I immediately picked up Tatiana De Rosnay's best-selling novel Sarah's Key (St. Martin's Griffin), which has now been re-released as a movie tie-in paperback.

The novel follows two timelines and points-of-view in alternating chapters. One is of Sarah, a 10-year-old in Paris who was arrested with her mother and father as part of the infamous Vélodrome d'Hiver roundup of 13,000 Jews by French police in July 1942.

The parallel story takes place 60 years later and follows journalist Julia Jaramond's investigation into the roundup for a magazine piece.

Sarah's story is by far the more gripping. The description of the velodrome, where the Jews were kept under appalling conditions for several days before being transferred to transit camps, is heart-wrenching. It's made worse by our knowing Sarah's terrible secret – that she had hidden her younger brother in a closet in their Paris apartment, thinking she'd be able to come back for him later.

Julia's story, on the other hand, doesn't tug at the heartstrings as much. As you'd expect, while researching the roundup, Julia unlocks a family secret that links the two stories together.

The novel's hard-hitting revelations are exciting and make for an excellent page-turner, but the story's pace is slowed somewhat by a distracting domestic side-story with Julia's annoying husband Bertrand.

Yet, Sarah's Key's emotional depth and horrifically realistic descriptions more than make up for the book's minor flaws. This is a very moving book.

Schachter and Hatch second in national beach tournament

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Sam Schachter teamed up with Maverick Hatch to win the silver medal at the 2011 Beach Volleyball National Championships last week.

Played at Ashbridges Bay in Toronto's Beach neighbourhood, the tournament saw Schachter and Hatch lose the gold medal contest to the veteran team of Ben Saxton and Christian Redmann. Schachter and Hatch started well, winning the first game 22-20, but they dropped the second game 21-15 before losing the tie-breaker, 15-10.

"We didn't quite hold up as long as we wanted to," Schachter said afterward. "We weren't getting the aces and getting the steals we wanted to."

Schachter, who teamed with Garrett May last winter to win the Under-21 world beach volleyball championships in Turkey, said their first serves weren't scoring and he and Hatch were regularly on the defensive.

"They put the pressure on us," he said, "We never recovered after we lost serves."

Nevertheless, winning a silver medal is nothing to be embarrassed about. Going into the tournament, which attracted the best "senior" players in Canada, he and Hatch were seeded third. "We finished second. When you finish higher than your seed, it satisfies," he said.

"It's a good achievement for us, especially considering how young we are."

Buoyed by the presence of family, the two started with a 4-0 record, including a win over Josh Binstock and Matt Zbyszewski. Binstock and Zbyszewski went on to win the bronze medal.

The national tournament marks the end of the tournament beach volleyball season, although elite level training continues. Last week, Schachter joined other members of the national team at the Downsview Hangar to train and compete for funding. Top teams such as Schachter and Hatch travel the world to participate in events sanctioned by the FIVB, the sport's elite governing body.

Sam Schachter, middle, remains one of Canada's best beach volleyball players.

After teaming with May to win the junior world championship in Alanya, Turkey, last year, Schachter turned pro, and switched partners. That meant changing his style of play.

With May, the six-foot-five Schachter was the team's blocker. With Hatch, the roles reversed and Schachter adopted a more defensive posture back in the sand. Moving back from the net made sense, since Schachter, who would seem to be a giant compared to ordinary folks, is average in height on the world tour. Hatch is two inches taller.

"We had a really good season," Schachter said. "It's our first year on tour. There's still a little bit of a learning curve in terms of what we're expected to do."

As tour rookies, it's wasn't always expected that they would go far, but Schachter said they "made two main draws and finished ninth in one of them. That's an exceptional finish for a first-year team."

Their best result came on home soil at the Quebec Open Jeep in July, when they earned 240 points and $6,000 between them.

Earlier, they finished 25th in Prague and 41st in Shanghai and Brasilia.

Ex-Duke Hoopster Jon Scheyer makes aliyah

JTA

TEL AVIV— Former Duke University basketball standout Jon Scheyer arrived recently in Israel and immediately made aliyah.

Scheyer, who signed in June to play with Israel's championship Maccabi Tel Aviv team, landed in Israel on a group aliyah flight organized by Nefesh B'Nefesh in co-operation with the Jewish Agency and the Ministry of Immigrant Absorption.

"I am really looking forward to starting my new life in Israel and playing for Maccabi Tel Aviv," Scheyer said.

Scheyer, a guard who during his senior year helped lead the Blue Devils to the 2010 NCAA championship, signed a two-year contract with Maccabi, which was the runner-up to the Euroleague champions this year and has won the Euroleague championship four times.

The team by Israeli rules is limited to no more than four foreign players. Since Scheyer has made aliyah, he will not count as one of the four.

"I wanted Jon already last season, and I'm very happy that we managed to sign him," Maccabi coach David Blatt told reporters at the signing, adding that Scheyer is "a very talented and smart player" and "a true winner."

"Not less importantly he is a Jew who is coming to Israel," Blatt said, "and I wish he will stay here for many more years."

Dead Dreams is a macabre sci-fi/thriller

Christian Potenza, left, is The Sandman and Corey Sevier has the role of Carl in the movie Dead Dreams. [David Nardi and Summer Pictures Inc. photo]

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Solving a murder normally takes a lot of sleuthing and gathering of physical evidence.

But in Josh Koffman's sci-fi/thriller Dead Dreams – the Toronto director's second major feature release after 2009's The Jazzman, a tribute to his grandfather, renowned jazz musician Moe Koffman – the cat and mouse game of detective work on a murder takes a metaphysical turn as viewers try to figure out what exactly happened and who perpetrated a series of brutal crimes against women.

Set in an undisclosed Canadian town, the movie features riveting performances by Canadian actors Corey Sevier and Christian Potenza.

Sevier plays Carl, a man who awakens in a dingy motel room with no memory of who he is and with a shady companion, Potenza, who calls himself "The Sandman."

Without a memory to guide him, Carl becomes unwittingly involved in The Sandman's machinations and slowly begins to question his motivations.

What he comes to know, through what The Sandman reveals in drips and drabs, is that someone murdered his wife and unborn baby and that it may or may not be The Sandman.

But without proof, and with increasingly cryptic advice from The Sandman, Carl finds himself alone, confused, angry and disoriented as his memory returns in bits and pieces after The Sandman drugs him.

Potenza turns in a captivating performance as the mysterious Sandman, while Sevier ably demonstrates a man in turmoil with seemingly little recourse but to follow his self-appointed guide blindly as he's led by the nose into situations he'd likely never agree to otherwise.

Koffman keeps the gore quotient high throughout the film, with graphic scenes of bodies decomposing in acid, various body parts turning up in the woods, dental torture sequences and savage attacks on the female victims by a faceless stranger.

Dead Dreams will be a difficult watch for those usually too squeamish to view a horror or thriller film. But for fans of the mystery genre, it's a cerebral adventure into the mind and motives of a serial killer.

The movie makes its theatrical debut in Collingwood, Ont., at Galaxy Collingwood on Oct. 12 and 13 at 7 p.m. and will also open in Toronto's AMC Dundas Square on Oct. 14.

Dead Dreams will also première on Super Channel on Halloween weekend.

Madoff paid the price for his mendacity

With the deep recession of 2008 and 2009 gripping the country, Madoff's elaborate Ponzi scheme collapsed, leaving investors in a lurch and exposing Madoff as a crook of monumental proportions.

Several of his victims, many of whom were Jewish, appear on screen bewailing their fate. "We lost everything," says a distraught woman.

"You have to be a real evil person to do this," says Markopolos.

Chasing Madoff suggests that Madoff was not the only culprit in this drama.

Bernard Madoff

Feeder funds he worked with had no interest in looking beyond the shiny façade, because they were growing fat on their association with Madoff.

And more than 300 companies aided and abetted him.

Madoff, having been imprisoned for life, has paid the price for his mendacity. But many of the people who put their trust in Madoff, only to lose their savings, still seek justice.

This is the message that this timely film delivers fearlessly.

Volunteer builds bridges in the community

Laura Fixman
Intern

Elana Metter said that volunteering is the perfect way to become part of a community and to make improvements to it.

Metter, 31, has been volunteering with the Annex Shul since 2007, when she decided that she ensure that the shul had a Shabbat dinner every week. With only one paid employee, spiritual leader Yacov Fruchter, Metter said you know your contribution is necessary. That's one of the things that makes volunteering at the Annex Shul special for her.

"If you're given something to do and you don't do it, it doesn't get done," Metter said. "Part of what makes it such a special place is because of the investment of the community."

She added that the Annex Shul is much different than the synagogue she attended while growing up because everything was done for her there. At the Annex Shul, even being involved in setting up chairs is important because then you think about acoustics and how the service looks, she said.

Her role as a volunteer has changed over the years; now she is a member of the Annex Shul advisory board. She's also involved in developing a family education program, which was inspired by a conference she attended in April 2010. She said that making changes to an organization is as easy as having an idea.

"If there's something you want to change, you kind of have to go for it," Metter said.

She added that what she loves about the Annex Shul is the fact that it's for young people, and it's not like their parents' shuls. She said what makes the Annex Shul what it is, is that you can come as you are and shape what the shul becomes. At the Annex Shul, she said it doesn't matter what you wear or how often you come; people there are always happy to see you. She is particularly looking forward to the High Holiday services coming up.

"I grew up in a fairly big-box shul, but at Annex it's the most meaningful High Holidays that I've ever experienced," Metter said.

Metter has also been a volunteer in several political campaigns and for Mount Sinai Hospital. She was nominated for a UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Top 20 Under 40 Award, given to volunteers in organizations that serve young professionals.

"I thought it was a huge honour," Metter said. "It was very touching that they thought of me."

She said that at the Annex Shul she gets to bring people of all different levels of Jewish observance together, and she also tries to bring together the community outside of the shul. Metter wants to challenge peoples' perceptions about members of the Jewish community with different beliefs than their own.

One of the ways she has tried to build bridges within the Jewish community is through a reading group that she runs with a haredi rebbetzin. The group includes 35 women, ranging from haredi Jews to a young woman who once debated whether to attend synagogue on Yom Kippur. Metter said she enjoys hearing all of the women's different reactions and perspectives on the book they're reading.

"We have more in common than we have different," she said. "I wanted to make our community a little bit stronger by bringing together a spectrum of women and helping them to examine why they believe what they believe."

She added that while creating unity and volunteering in the community are important to her, Israel is also one of her passions. She wants all members of the Jewish community to feel connected to Israel.

"If you want the Jewish community to be here in the future, we need active volunteers," Metter said. "It's also important that we all feel like we're a part of Israel, not just a part of whatever denomination we belong to."

Metter is currently in Israel, on a trip organized by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) to introduce Canadian members of Parliament to Israel. She's one of the young Jewish leaders showing Canadian politicians Israel. They will experience Shabbat at the Western Wall and wine tasting in the Galilee, and they will get to see Israeli technological innovations, including Project Better Place, which is building a network of electric cars. Metter has wanted to be involved in a trip like this since she was asked two years ago, but this was the first time she was able to go.

"I've always been passionate about Israel and interested in politics," Metter said. "This is a way to advocate for Israel in a real way that can make a difference. I can show the [Canadian] leaders of the country, who are the people that dictate the laws, what Israel's really about and create a real connection for them."

Metter added that volunteering in the Jewish community has taught her that when you do things for yourself, you are able to take ownership of the community you belong to. She said that the Annex Shul, in particular, taught her that lesson well.

"You can't just wait for other people to do things," she said. "Volunteering is about taking the future of your community into your own hands."

Community open to new ideas

How does a community come together to look at new ideas and decide which ones to make a small investment in to see if they will succeed?

The GTA community brought forward 78 proposals to the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's SixPoints Jewish Venture Philanthropy Fund. Sixty individuals pooled their financial resources and business-planning skills to fund and support new and innovative programs consistent with Jewish values. Each proposal team was asked to record a short video and write up its project, describing the possible benefit to the community.

Shoresh Jewish Environmental Programs was the only group to propose a sustainable solution for the Jewish community (http://bit.ly/6points-shoresh). Its proposal looks for a permanent home for Shoresh's Kavanah Garden, temporarily located on the Lebovic Jewish Community Campus. Community members from across the spectrum use the garden and its programs to strengthen their Jewish identity and inspire social and environmental responsibility. Shoresh and 35 others agreed to present their proposal. The SixPoints funders will use their expertise to help improve proposals and will select three to five projects to share $300,000 of funding.

Sustainable Jew

Fred Winegust

Concurrently, the ClimateSpark Social Venture Challenge (http://bit.ly/ClimateSpark) is just beginning under the leadership of Julia Langer, based on a previous challenge mounted by the Toronto Atmospheric Fund (TAF). A City of Toronto agency, TAF has helped community leaders and green entrepreneurs identify and advance emission reduction and clean air ventures for over 20 years.

ClimateSpark is looking for 10 high-impact, self-sustaining initiatives that can lead to significant local reductions in energy consumption and greenhouse gas emissions. As with SixPoints, applicants need to record a short video with an overview of their idea. Additionally, they need to succinctly describe in words how the idea would work, to provide some way to quantify the positive impact it can have on the environment and explain how the project would become self supporting over five years.

ClimateSpark SVC has a diverse group of experts, from professional consultants and community leaders to entrepreneurs and greenhouse gas emissions analysts. Through social networking, these experts, along with other members of the public, will offer their comments and intellectual capital to mentor contestants and strengthen plans submitted. The 10 selected projects will receive additional private coaching. The final three will be eligible for a pool of financing from grant-providers and private financiers.

Some of the community teams that may have hesitated to bring an environmentally related project to SixPoints may want to consider proposing their idea to the ClimateSpark community.

"Both ClimateSpark and SixPoints have a similar objective of bringing value to their community" said Adam Minsky, head of community capacity building for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. "I recognize that solicitation of community input through social network crowdsourcing and having different funding sources are two critical differences. There will be lessons to be learned from both models."

"It's exciting to see open-source contests emerging in different sectors in Toronto," Langer says. "It shows awareness that complex problem-solving relies on accessing knowledge and ideas from many sources and on mutual refinement that makes good ideas great."

Gala raises money for children with disabilities

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

The second annual Three to Be Stems of Hope Gala – Robotica, presented by KRG Children's Charitable Foundation, to be held Sept. 24 at KoolHaus Toronto, has a dual purpose.

It aims to raise money to fund a robotics device for Holland Bloorview Rehabilitative Hospital, which helps children with disabilities learn to walk, and it continues to support the Hospital for Sick Children's stem-cell program, which helps children with neurological disorders.

Organizer Dana Florence, the mother of 3-1/2 year old triplets, all of whom have cerebral palsy, started the charity Three to Be with her husband, Jared, after the triplets were born.

"Three to Be works with [Sick Kids] and Holland Bloorview to support research initiatives that further the development of innovative treatments and therapies for children with neurological disorders," she said.

There are currently no foundations or agencies in Canada that fund research and therapy for the spectrum of disorders that include cerebral palsy, epilepsy and autism, Florence said.

Dana and Jared Florence with their triplets.

"Last year's inaugural gala was a huge success – nearly $500,000 was raised – and we are thrilled to be doing it again this year," she said.

"Every dollar we can raise toward research into these disorders is another step toward finding treatments that have the potential to make a huge impact and offer hope in a child's life."

Florence said the evening features a musical performance by the Barenaked Ladies and an appearance by Olympic gold-medal freestyle skier Alexandre Bilodeau.

"Alex has a brother with [cerebral palsy], and when we met Alex at the Olympics, he was touched by our story. He decided to donate a pair of skis, which brought in $15,000. Isadore Sharp [founder of the Four Seasons Hotel and Resorts] won the skis and donated them back. Alex and his brother will auction them off this year."

The evening, hosted by Leslie Roberts and Anne Mroczkowski of Global Toronto, will also feature interactive exhibits, a live auction hosted by TSN host Michael Landsberg, and a silent auction.

"It is not a sit-down dinner. It's more of a fun evening," said Florence.

Peace treaty with Egypt must be kept: Netanyahu

Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu addressed the media last weekend about the crisis at the Israeli embassy in Cairo. He specifically thanked U.S. President Barack Obama for personally intervening with Egyptian officials to rescue the six Israeli security guards trapped by the rampaging mob at the embassy. Inset, Netanyahu embraces one of the security guards who was rescued.

A violent protest at the Israeli Embassy in Cairo last Friday led to the evacuation of its ambassador, his family and the staff of some 80 people, and raised the ire of western leaders and North American Jewry.

In a statement following the attack, Prime Minister Stephen Harper said Canada condemned the protest and called on Egypt to continue to protect all embassy staff.

"Canada expects Egypt to honour its commitment to uphold its international agreements, including its [1979] peace treaty with Israel," Harper said. "As Egypt transforms itself into a representative democracy, it is critical for both countries to work hard on reducing tensions between their peoples so that regional stability may be attained."

Most Israeli Embassy staff and their families were eventually shuttled to an emergency Israel Air Force flight out of Cairo via a rescue operation co-ordinated by Israel and the United States, with the assistance of Egyptian forces.

According to reports out of Israel, U.S. Secretary of Defence Leon Panetta urged Egypt's Supreme Military Council head Mohamed Hussein Tantawi to end the attack or "suffer very severe consequences."

During the Sept. 9 riot outside the embassy, violent protesters broke down the eight-foot-high security wall surrounding the embassy compound and entered the building. They then spray-painted anti-Israel slogans throughout the building, lit fires and looted the offices.

In a special rescue operation, an Egyptian commando unit later removed six stranded embassy employees hiding in a safe room.

More than 1,000 Egyptians demonstrated at the embassy, many after an Egyptian Facebook group called on protesters to gather at the embassy and "urinate on the wall," Ynet reported.

During the demonstration, protesters tore the Israeli flag down from the high-rise building's roof for the second time in a month.

In a televised address on Saturday night, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said the Middle East is "now undergoing a political earthquake of historic proportions."

He said Israel would work with Egypt to return its ambassador to Cairo.

MP Shows Gaza Pics

MONTREAL — Bloc Québécois MP Maria Mourani is hosting a controversial exhibition of photos taken in Gaza mainly in the aftermath of Israel's conflict with Hamas in the winter of 2008-09 in her Montreal constituency office. Most show devastation and human suffering. The exhibition, titled Human Drama in Gaza, was described by the Quebec-Israel Committee as "offensive, manipulative and dishonest" when it made its Canadian première at Cinéma du Parc in early 2010. Mourani, the MP for Ahuntsic, is showing the 44 photos, distributed by professional news agencies, until Sept. 23 in conjunction with Canadians for Justice and Peace in the Middle East, which produced the exhibition.

Group Opposes Bid

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The liberal U.S. Jewish group J Street opposes Palestinian efforts to achieve statehood recognition through the United Nations, as well as plans to penalize the Palestinians for making the bid, the dovish pro-Israel group told JTA last week. Palestinian statehood should come about through negotiations with Israel and not unilaterally, director Jeremy Ben-Ami said. The group backs Obama administration plans to veto any UN Security Council resolution that would establish such a state and has urged Palestinian leaders to defer plans to introduce such a resolution later this month.

Security Funding Up

STOCKHOLM — The Swedish government has allocated $622,000 in its fall budget to increase security at the country's synagogues. The funding for 2012 is for stepped-up police protection, but could be used to purchase security cameras as well. Sweden has been accused of not taking anti-semitism seriously. Last December, the Simon Wiesenthal Center advised Jews to avoid travelling to southern Sweden following a series of antisemitic incidents. Sweden had 161 antisemitic incidents reported in 2010. Some 20,000 Jews live there.

Designer Convicted

PARIS — A Paris court has convicted former Christian Dior designer John Galliano for making antisemitic insults and gave him a suspended sentence of 6,000 euros ($8,400) in fines. Galliano was given no prison time and doesn't have to pay the fine. The court found him guilty of "public insults based on origin, religious affiliation, race or ethnicity" stemming from two separate incidents at a Paris bar. The accusations cost Galliano his job at the luxury house and roiled the fashion world. Galliano said he had been under the influence of alcohol and prescription drugs and couldn't recall the incidents.

Calif. Bill Would Ban Circumcision Bans

Jerry Brown

SACRAMENTO — California's state legislature approved a bill that would prevent the state's municipalities from banning male circumcision.

The California Assembly approved the bill Sept. 6. It comes on the heels of two attempts in California to place circumcision bans on the November ballot.

The bill now goes to Gov. Jerry Brown for his signature and would take effect immediately. Brown has not taken a position on the bill, according to the Sacramento Bee.

A state Superior Court judge in California ruled in July that an anti-circumcision measure in San Francisco be stuck from the ballot because the city lacked the authority to regulate a medical procedure. Activists in Santa Monica then withdrew an identical proposal that had not yet made it to the ballot.

If passed, the San Francisco initiative would have made the practice of circumcising a minor misdemeanour punishable by a fine of up to $1,000 or up to one year in jail, and offered no exemption for religious ritual. It would have been the first time that such a measure appeared on a ballot in a U.S. city, according to the Anti-Defamation League.

CIJA prepares communities for PA's UN vote

Andy Levy-Aizenkopf
Staff Reporter

Document aimed at stoking grassroots discussion among Jews

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) has released an information packet to tell the Canadian Jewish community what the Sept. 20 UN vote on a Palestinian unilateral declaration of independence might mean for Israel and Jews worldwide.

The five-page Word document, called Understanding the Quest for Peace and Coexistence, was distributed by e-mail last week to CIJA's federation partners across the country and smaller Jewish communities served by UIA Federations Canada.

It is part of the new organization's "national engagement strategy," a spokesperson for the centre said.

Aimed at stoking a grassroots discussion among Jews in Canada, the document points out why a Palestinian Universal Declaration of Independence (UDI) would harm the peace process, regardless of which position – for or against – is taken on a Palestinian state.

Shimon Fogel, CIJA's CEO, said this particular engagement exercise is important now because it will help achieve "greater fluency within our own constituency on the core issues underlying" the Palestinian UN gambit.

"Regardless of what initiatives [CIJA] will have to contemplate once the UN drama is over, it's going to require a... knowledge level" within the Jewish community, he said.

Fogel said one of the roles of CIJA – the newly consolidated voice of former organizations such as Canadian Jewish Congress, Canada-Israel Committee and the University Outreach Committee – is to help educate and engage the community in some of the "urgent issues of the day.

"They have to understand and explore their own comfort levels regarding how these issues play out over time. They can only do that by being empowered to explore some of these issues," he said.

Fogel acknowledged that CIJA has its own position regarding how it views the Palestinian initiative and the peace process but was not seeking to foist that on the community.

"Our effort here is to ensure we're living up to the education part of our mandate. To educate and engage."

Some of the main points in the CIJA document include informing community members that the Palestinian Authority's UN effort seeks to further delegitimize Israel on the world stage more than it does to create a homeland for its people.

While it's expected that the Palestinian resolution will be vetoed in the UN Security Council by the United States, there is a good chance it will receive enough votes in the General Assembly to pass, giving the Palestinians a symbolic victory.

In such an event, the CIJA document states, such a win without a real peace agreement in place with Israel would be "used by many anti-Israel activists as a basis to further delegitimize Israel.

Bad week for diplomats

International diplomacy and the rule of law took a considerable beating last week.

Angry that Israel has not formally apologized to him for the Mavi Marmara deaths (which occurred when Israeli soldiers boarded the ship on its way to Gaza to break the Israeli naval blockade) and that the United Nations did not endorse his own particular views of the 2010 incident, Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan expelled the Israeli ambassador from Ankara.

Angry that Israel had caused the unintended deaths of five Egyptian soldiers caught up in the hot pursuit by the Israel Defence Forces of the Palestinian terrorists who had infiltrated near Eilat and killed eight Israelis, a mob of 1,000 Egyptians stormed, rampaged and ransacked the Israeli Embassy in Cairo. The ambassador and his family were forced to flee for their lives. Indeed some 80 embassy personnel and family members were evacuated to Israel in a harrowing nighttime rescue. But for the intervention of U.S. President Barack Obama, six Israeli security officers would likely have been killed by the raging mob.

From the editor's desk...

The Arab street protests that months ago mesmerized so many Middle East pundits is proving to be more of a stormy winter than the spring they rhapsodized. Democracy, it must be remembered and emphasized, cannot flower overnight in barren terrain. It blooms, if at all, after a long, careful nurturing of the soil of due process, tolerance and the absolute paramountcy of the rule of law.

Next week, Arab streets might once again fill with agitation and the familiar sights and noisy sounds of fist-pumping, roiling humanity intent on emphatically registering their support for the Palestinian leadership's conscription of the UN General Assembly to the cause of endorsing a unilateral declaration of independence for a Palestinian state.

And when the Israeli government, and perhaps too some western governments deplore the duplicitous behaviour by the Palestinians, stormy winter in the Arab world will morph into fire and ice. Arab spring will become Arab tempest.

It is hard to imagine how the Palestinians' ploy will bring the two sides closer together. Israel will become further isolated in parts of the world.

So often in the past, American, European and other interlocutors pressed on Israel the need to adopt measures that would foster confidence for the Israelis and the peace process among the Palestinians. And equally as often, Israel would comply.

The 10-month moratorium on all housing construction last year in east Jerusalem and the West Bank was one of the most recent examples. But as we know, the moratorium was for naught. Abbas still refused to negotiate with Israel. That did not surprise too many observers, however, because they knew deep in his heart, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas is not interested in negotiating a resolution of the conflict with Israel.

Apart from a declaration of war or an eruption of carefully orchestrated violence, could there be any measure more destroying of Israeli confidence in the Palestinian leadership and in the bilateral peace process than the Unilateral Declaration of Independence (UDI) gambit at the United Nations?

Exploiting every eruption on the Arab street of anti-Israel, anti-Jewish and anti-American sentiment will be the theocratic rulers of Iran, whose most beckoning aspiration, it seems, is to constantly foment instability in the region by propagating hatred against the Jewish state and undermining Sunni Muslim powers.

Only 2-1/2 weeks ago, Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad celebrated Al Quds day by reminding the world that the annihilation of the Jewish state and presumably, too, by extension, the genocide of its people, was unwavering national Iranian policy.

Israel defends itself against terror. As a result Turkey expels the Israeli ambassador from Ankara and the Israeli ambassador is forced to flee for his life from Cairo.

Israel pleads for more than three years with Abbas to return to negotiations. Abbas refuses. Yet the world accuses Israel of intransigence.

Israel is the only country in the United Nations to be threatened with annihilation by a fellow country, Iran. Yet not one legal process as a result has been launched in the United Nations against the Iranians.

As Rabbi Reuven Bulka, of Congregation Machzikei Hadas asked two years ago in Kelowna, B.C., of a gathering of the United Church of Canada, pondering a boycott of Israel and Israeli products, "What's wrong with this picture?"

"Boycott," Rabbi Bulka argued, "is another loaded word for many Jewish people, who regard such campaigns as a new mutation of antisemitism that seeks to delegitimize Israel and cast it as a pariah state. I have no problem with criticizing Israel. But if I don't hear from the people that are criticizing Israel an equal and vociferous criticizing of those who want to destroy Israel and who have said very clearly that that's their agenda, then I say, 'What's wrong with this picture? How can you boycott one and not the other?'" We ask ourselves the same question.

TELLING THE TRUTH

Classes at Ryerson University resumed just a week ago, but anti-Israel activists wasted no time in demonstrating in front of the downtown Toronto campus. A mock "apartheid wall" was set up as part of a Ryerson Student Union event on Sept. 8. Inset, Neta Koppel, the Israel fellow for Hillel of Greater Toronto, responded by handing students who walked past the display "truth cards" that contained facts and information about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

United Church clarifies member's role at rally

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The United Church of Canada is distancing itself from one of its members who spoke at an anti-Israel al-Quds rally at Queen's Park in which speakers called Israel a cancer and blamed "Zionists" for injustices around the world.

Karin Brothers was acting strictly in her personal capacity and not as a representative of the church, spokespeople from the church's national office and her local congregation said.

"We didn't ask her to go," said Rev. Martha Ter Kuile, minister of the Bloor Street Church, where Brothers is a member.

Brothers "was there in her personal capacity and not as a representative of the United Church of Canada," Rev. Ter Kuile added.

The rally was held on Aug. 28 and featured attacks on Israel from a variety of speakers. With Hezbollah flags flying, one speaker called Israel a cancer while another described Zionists as "racist," "inhuman," and "barbarians."

Organized by CASMO, the Canadian Shia Muslims Organization, the rally was filmed by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) and posted on YouTube. Brothers was introduced as being "from the United Church of Canada." She began her address by saying, "We need you."

Rev. Bruce Gregersen, the United Church's chief program officer, said Brothers did not represent the church at the rally. "I think it was unfortunate" she was described as such, he said.

"It would not be appropriate to say she represented the United Church of Canada."

"We did not agree to be part of a rally of this kind," he said, adding the church has "no history of working with this group."

A statement released by the church reiterated that the "United Church of Canada unequivocally supports the right of Israel to exist and believes that the two-state solution for Israel and Palestine is one that holds the most promise for peace."

Relations between the Jewish community and the United Church have been strained in recent years, with former Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber once saying they were at the "breaking point."

Congress was concerned that the United Church had partnered with Independent Jewish Voices, a small group that called for a boycott of Israel and which had received a $900 subsidy from the church.

At its 2009 General Council in Kelowna, the church considered a boycott of Israel but rejected it. Around the same time, the Toronto Conference of the church employed the term "ethnic cleansing" to describe Israeli policies.

Describing the church's position on the Middle East, Rev. Gregersen wrote in 2010, that "In the end the decision was not for a national boycott but for all parts of the church to 'immediately enter into consultation, dialogue, study and prayer, and then to take appropriate action towards ending the illegal occupation of Palestinian territory and enter into conversation as to how to move the two peoples toward reconciliation (including, but not limited to economic boycott).'"

Junction Shul celebrates 100th anniversary

Jared Lindzon
Special to The CJN

Deep in the heart of the west Toronto community known as the Junction lies a monument to early Jewish heritage in the city. And although the Jewish population of the neighbourhood today can best be described as sparse, the Junction was once a hub for Jewish immigrants from eastern Europe, primarily Poland and Russia.

In 1909 those early Jewish settlers of western Toronto established a congregation known as Knesseth Israel, and in September 1911, they opened the doors to what would become widely known as the Junction Shul, which today is Ontario's oldest original synagogue that's still in use.

The celebration of the shul's 100th year in operation began Sept. 7 with the launch of One Hundred Years at The Junction Shul, a book that documents the history of the synagogue and stories of its members.

"This is an amazing group of people, and their dedication to their history, their heritage, and to this building has just been exemplary," said Neil Ross, president of the West Toronto Junction Historical Society and co-author of the book. "And the dedication in the community, the welcome that I felt as I've done the interviews and been on the committees, has been overwhelming."

According to Ross, the area is known as the Junction because it is home to the only intersection of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railway in all of Canada. This made the area an important economic base, one filled with opportunity for early Jewish settlers.

"Jews from eastern Europe who had been in the needle trade were invited to pay a certain amount of money to buy property and build a home in the Junction," Ross said. "Then they built a needle factory, and when the needle factory was built, they worked in it, except the needle factory didn't really last. But we believe it was this influx that brought the community up to a level where it built a shul."

According to the synagogue's gabbai, Jules Kronis, the community was established to house early settlers who were fleeing pogroms in eastern Europe.

"The pogroms increased the Jewish population of Toronto," he said. "The Jewish population of Toronto in 1900 was 3,000, in 1910 it was 12,000, and the Wharf, the district downtown, was probably overcrowded, unsafe and unhealthy. And just as we move out to the suburbs today, the Jewish community established a satellite in the Junction."

The founding families of the congregation purchased the synagogue's lot at 56 Maria St. in 1911 for $520. It was that same group of congregants that contributed their time, effort and money to build the synagogue, which still sits on same site today.

And 100 years later, it also continues to maintain the same welcoming spirit and inclusiveness from which it sprang.

"There are very few other places to go [in the area]," said Bob Pomerantz, who has been a member of the synagogue for 25 years. "You didn't need tickets. You didn't need to know anybody. You just walked in, and they had a seat for you and they treated you very warmly."

The celebration of the Junction Shul's centennial continues Sept. 15 with a special morning service with Jewish dignitaries, and on Sept. 17 with Shabbat morning services.

The celebration concludes Sept. 18 with a community-wide street party that's open to the public. It will feature walking tours of Maria Street, where the original residents of the homes will be speaking about their lives in the Junction, as well as food and entertainment.

"It's going to be great," said synagogue president Edwin Goldstein. "We're having entertainment, singers and musicians and a comedian. A lot of people stepped up to the plate, and I couldn't have done this without having all of those people."

Odious hatred on Queen's Park's steps

Ever since 1979, when Iran's late Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini decreed its observance, Al-Quds (Jerusalem) day has been specifically singled out from the annual Shia Muslim theological calendar to hector the world against the presence of a sovereign Jewish state in the Middle East. In at least part of the Shia Muslim world, the day is set aside, in solemn religious dedication, to urge the elimination of the State of Israel and the genocide of its people.

Alas, we have grown uneasily used to seeing such demonstrations of virulent, anti-Israel theology on streets in the Middle East, though they still never fail to infuriate.

But we have seldom, if ever, seen or heard such vile incitements to hatred on the streets of Canada, let alone on the steps of the legislature of the country's largest province. And yet, 2-1/2 weeks ago, on Aug. 28, at a rally commemorating Al Quds day organized by the Canadian Shia Muslims Organization at Queen's Park, in front of the legislature of Ontario, a series of speakers spewed foul, odious venom toward the Jewish state.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Advocacy captured the sordid spectacle on video. (It is available for viewing on the centre's website.) One speaker, in a near frothing frenzy, after calling the Israelis inhuman, racist and barbarians, warns that the day is coming "when we Muslims will march on Palestine and liberate Palestine." Another speaker told the audience that "whenever you see injustice… there is 100 per cent involvement by the Zionist regime, the same Zionist regime that sucks the resources, the blood and everything that belongs to the people all across the world." A third speaker called Israel a cancer on the world and rhetorically asked the assembly: "Remember what is the end of a cancer? It is killed to make sure the body stays alive." There was nothing too subtle or nuanced in any of the speakers' messages.

The United Church of Canada, which had been implicated as having joined the rally through the attendance of one of its members, disavowed any implied endorsement of the rally.

The video is shocking.

The rally was an obscenity, an affront to the very wide norms of heated public debate and discourse that democracy condones. The language was clearly antisemitic. It may also have violated the criminal code of Canada, which expressly prohibits incitement of hatred against an identifiable group in a public place. Could there be a more symbolically significant place in Ontario than the steps of the legislature?

It is an outrage that no public officials have condemned the incident. And it is a sorry comment upon us all that the freedoms we so deeply cherished were contemptuously abused on the very doorstep of democracy's highest institution in Ontario.

Historical record of 'decent' Germans

Although Sheldon Kirshner concludes that Konrad Jarausch "appears to have been a decent German," I cannot ignore the historical record of millions of "decent" Germans who firstly were ready to overlook the sinister aspects to Hitler's aims and vote him into power, followed by their willing participation in his illegal and murderous conquest and domination of sovereign nations, and who somehow managed to be unaware of the enormity of the Nazis systematic annihilation of six million Jews and enslavement of countless numbers of others ("German soldier never lost his sense of decency," books, Sept. 1).

Other Germans have sought to explain away or bury any thought of the horrific facts of their nation's past presumably, one imagines, in an attempt to make it possible for them to live out their lives in some semblance of normalcy. But I don't buy it. Jarausch's son would do better to publish his own book acknowledging his father's ultimate failure to stand up and refuse to participate in Hitler's criminal campaign, his unequivocal acknowledgement and admission of the facts of his nation's past, the devotion of his life to the education of his countrymen about the truth of their inheritance, and his vow to work tirelessly to prevent the recurrence of such hideous conduct by his nation or that of any other. Through such a life, Jarausch might finally achieve some sense of salvation – if, indeed, that is what he seeks.

Not represented by community organization

I commend Sally Zerker for her courageous article, "The restructuring of communal advocacy" (Aug. 25). Many community organizations are so far removed from the ordinary citizens that it really takes chutzpah for them even to call themselves "Jewish" anything. I don't know whom they represent, but it isn't me or anyone I know. I generally hear from them when they call me for donations or when I see them celebrating and honouring one another in the society columns. I've never been called for an opinion of what I think these organizations ought to stand for, the effect of their services or how they spend their money, and I have never been provided with any useful assistance from them. And now that they are bunched up under one signature, in the name of whom do these people advocate?

Gehry supports theatre boycott

I noticed a sad irony in the column, "Israel's realist think-tank (2)" (Sept. 8). The use of architect Frank Gehry as an example of cutting "across disciplines" and interrelating "ideas with the complicated detail and intermeshing precision of a Frank Gehry-designed concert hall" loses its desired quality when coupled with the knowledge that Gehry has been publicly commended by the inappropriately named radical group Jewish Voice for Peace for being a supporter of BDS (the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement), by signing a petition supporting Israeli artists who refuse to perform in a Jewish theatre in Ariel, a West Bank settlement, and summoning others to do, despicably, the same.

Palestinian independence

I am writing about Yosef Tastassa's article, "Israelis will suffer from Palestinian independence" (Aug. 25). Tastassa is concerned about a proposed UN resolution, scheduled for Sept. 20, declaring Palestine a state. The present Israeli government gives lip service to promoting a peace treaty, which would establish a Palestinian state, but puts up so many pre-talk road blocks – the Palestinians have to recognize Israel as a Jewish state, Jerusalem is not divisible, no return of refugees, etc. – that negotiations cannot start. There is more onus on Israel, which wants to be seen as a progressive country, to promote genuine peace talks. Either the talks will be successful or they will demonstrate to the world that Israel really tried. If there ever is peace, the whole world knows it will involve an independent Palestinian state, so why worry about a silly UN resolution now? Israel regularly ignores UN resolutions it does not like.

Abbas is riding the back of a tiger

David H. Goldberg

Despite Palestinian legislator Hanan Ashrawi's recent charm offensive in Ottawa, Canada could soon find itself among a small "moral majority" of western democracies opposing a potentially explosive UN resolution unilaterally recognizing statehood for Palestine within the pre-1967 borders.

Much has been written about Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) leader Mahmoud Abbas' strategic decision to abandon the diplomatic process in favour of the "internationalization" and "legalization" of the conflict with Israel through the United Nations.

In the run-up to this month's 66th UN General Assembly (GA), Abbas' strategy bumped against a threatened United States veto of a direct Palestinian request to the UN Security Council for statehood recognition and full UN membership.

The PLO's focus then reportedly broadened to the GA. Without the U.S. veto and with the guaranteed support of the "non-aligned" and non-democratic countries that now dominate the United Nations, the GA was seen as the logical venue for the adoption of a "compromise resolution" upgrading the PLO's UN status from "observer" to "observer state." As a GA resolution, this action would be non-binding and baseless in international law. Nevertheless, it would effectively accord the PLO state status in all UN institutions (including the International Criminal Court and International Court of Justice) and grant de facto statehood to "Palestine" within the pre-1967 lines.

While ongoing negotiations could yet result in a different outcome, the following article speculates on the implications of such a resolution in the UN General Assembly.

The resolution would make a mockery of established principles concerning the recognition of states. Legal authorities question whether the Palestinians meet two of the four criteria for statehood recognition prescribed by the Montevideo Convention of 1933. Can Palestine be said to have "a defined territory" and "an effective government" when it is controlled by two separate governing authorities in two separate entities – Fatah in much of the West Bank, and the terrorist Hamas in Gaza, and when reconciliation efforts have foundered, mainly over who should be prime minister of a "government of technocrats"?

Israel's former UN ambassador Dore Gold acknowledges that an upgrading to de facto state status could advance the Palestinian strategy of forcing Israel entirely out of the West Bank through legal means, in that senior UN courts (whose jurisdictions normally apply only to disputes between sovereign states) might be more inclined to take seriously the "war crimes" and "crimes against humanity" allegations against Israel levelled by a UN-recognized Palestinian "state." But, Gold says, the Palestinians might have overplayed their hand. He argues that repeated published statements by Abbas and senior Palestinian officials explicitly declaring their intention to exploit the integrity and good offices of the World Court and the International Court of Justice to score meaningless public relations points against Israel might convince international jurists to finally say "no" to Palestinian frivolous, politically motivated claims against Israel.

Israel's ambassador to the United Nations, Ron Prosor, has noted that, in adopting their current diplomatic strategy, the Palestinians "have climbed on a tree, and the higher they climb the higher they request a ladder… What is going to happen in the end is that they will fall from the tree but they won't just hurt themselves, but they will [hurt] everyone else in the vicinity." (Emphasis added)

Mahmoud Abbas claims that the PLO's UN statehood bid "does not contradict the essence of the peace process" because it is "not a unilateral measure and does not aim at isolating Israel or delegitimizing it.

"We don't want to delegitimize Israel. We want to legitimize ourselves," Abbas contends.

Palestinian officials in the West Bank and east Jerusalem are working feverishly to ensure popular support for Abbas' call for "mass action, organized and co-ordinated in every place" immediately following the United Nation's anticipated adoption of a statehood resolution. But the Palestinian response is uncertain.

Eighty per cent of the Palestinian public believe that the No. 1 priority for the Palestinian leadership should be "creating new jobs" rather than "declaring Palestinian statehood" (four per cent), whereas two-thirds oppose a "third intifadah" and support diplomatic engagement with Israel over violent resistance.Other survey data paint a less rosy picture. Most critically, 76 per cent of Palestinians support having armed Palestinian security personnel, leadership's dilemma to that of riding a tiger: "Abbas' problem is that he will be humiliated if the UN votes and then nothing happens on the ground… So he is planning on jumping on the back of a tiger. The problem is that if he loses control of the tiger, he is doomed."

The Oslo II interim agreement of September 1995 prohibits unilateral measures by either side that will change the status of the West Bank pending the outcome of final status negotiations. A Palestinian unilateral request for UN de facto statehood recognition within the pre-1967 lines would constitute an explicit violation of this core provision. Moreover, it would create "unbridgeable gaps" between negotiating positions.

Israel has no interest in abrogating the Oslo accords – the only agreed-upon legal basis for negotiations toward the achievement of a two-state solution. But the onus would be on the PLO and the Palestinian Authority (PA) to abide by their agreed-upon obligations and commitments, especially concerning ending terrorism and anti-Israel incitement (including delegitimization). Much would depend on the Palestinians' handling of the popular response to a UN vote.

An Israeli official likens the Palestinian leadership's dilemma to that of riding a tiger: "Abbas' problem is that he will be humiliated if the UN votes and then nothing happens on the ground… So he is planning on jumping on the back of a tiger. The problem is that if he loses control of the tiger, he is doomed."

Palestinian officials in the West Bank and east Jerusalem are working feverishly to ensure popular support for Abbas' call for "mass action, organized and co-ordinated in every place" immediately following the United Nation's anticipated adoption of a statehood resolution. But the Palestinian response is uncertain.

Eighty per cent of the Palestinian public believe that the No. 1 priority for the Palestinian leadership should be "creating new jobs" rather than "declaring Palestinian statehood" (four per cent), whereas two-thirds oppose a "third intifadah" and support diplomatic engagement with Israel over violent resistance.Other survey data paint a less rosy picture. Most critically, 76 per cent of Palestinians support having armed Palestinian security personnel, immediately after UN statehood recognition, enforcing sovereignty over all of the West Bank, including Area C (controlled exclusively by Israel for security purposes, under the Oslo accords, with major security installations), "even if this leads to armed confrontations with the Israeli army and settlers." (Emphasis added) As leaked by Ha'aretz, the Israel defence establishment's main working assumption in "Operation Summer Seeds" (preparing the army and settlers for the possibility of confrontations with Palestinians after the expected General Assembly granting of statehood and full de jure membership) is that a UN Palestinian statehood resolution would provoke "a public uprising which will mainly include mass disorder… marches toward main junctions, Israeli communities and education centres, efforts at damaging symbols of [Israeli] government." (Emphasis added)

Israel Defence Forces commanders express confidence that, with additional riot-control training and new, non-lethal riot-dispersal equipment, IDF soldiers would meet any challenge. West Bank settlements have also received special IDF training along with specific instructions on "rules of engagement" should they be threatened by Palestinian demonstrators.

Member of Knesset Yohanan Plesner believes the Palestinian leadership has no interest in an escalation. But he warns that "the difference between non-violent and violent protests is just a spark," and that "there are enough groups that are interested in violence, like Hamas or Islamic Jihad."

And therein lies the essence of the nightmare scenario, certainly from an IDF perspective, but even more so for Abbas and the PLO: ostensibly peaceful Palestinian marches toward settlements and military positions in the West Bank would violently escalate (either incrementally or due to the actions of armed provocateurs) beyond the control-capacity of the Palestinian security forces (now functioning without IDF co-operation). With the PLO's governing legitimacy in ruins, Hamas would sweep Abbas and the PLO from power forever, and extend its influence – and by extension, that of Islamist Iran – throughout the West Bank and east Jerusalem. The vision of an Israeli-Palestinian reconciliation based on the two-state model would be shattered as Israelis would confront a new threat paradigm defined by Hamas terrorism and close-range missiles.

Extending the nightmare scenario, Syrian Palestinians and armed Syrian soldiers could be expected to swarm Israeli positions on the Golan Heights, in a recurrence of the events of last May's Nakba Day, with thousands of Palestinian refugees, backed (or forced) by Hezbollah gunmen, simultaneously crashing IDF guard posts on the Lebanese border. Meanwhile, a threatened "million-man" march of Egyptian Islamist militants might be heading toward Israeli crossing points in southern Sinai. The potential for violence in each of these scenarios would be extremely high, as would the possibility of an escalation to a regional conflagration conceivably involving non-conventional weapons.

Analysts agree that the Palestinian people would be among the big losers in such a nightmare scenario.

There is still time for Abbas and the PLO to avert this "train wreck." Diplomatic efforts will continue until the last minute to give them a way to honourably climb down – rather than fall embarrassingly – from the tree. Israel will, cautiously, support such efforts.

Israel's goal remains a negotiated two-state agreement. But efforts to resume direct bilateral negotiations and to help the Palestinians achieve their legitimate national objectives, despite their failed leadership, must not come at the expense of Israel's fundamental interests and security requirements.

A Rosh Hashanah lesson from the 'Blinkischer Rebbe'

On July 15, Ronnie Cahana, the 57-year-old rabbi of Congregation Beth-El in Montreal's Town of Mount Royal, suffered a massive stroke in his brainstem. He now lies immobilized in the Montreal Neurological Institute, unable to talk, walk or even wave.

Yet, his mind is intact and his spirit is soaring, and from his hospital bed, Rabbi Cahana is teaching his devoted congregants, his loving family and the rest of us, about the soul's power and Judaism's deeper meaning, even when we lose the physical, the material. "I live in a broken place," he said when stricken, "but there's holy work to do."

Rabbi Cahana's body is in trouble. A ventilator and other tubes do for him what most of us do naturally. Nevertheless, he may be the healthiest – and happiest – person I know. "Emotional paralysis is far worse than physical paralysis," he preaches. "To live humanly is to believe in the pure and the profound. To live Jewishly… is to choose the blessing over the curse. I choose blessing and feel blessed."

Before the stroke, this gangly, 6'2 Houston-born rabbi was the least Texan Texan, and the most unconventional Conservative rabbi. I knew – I befriended Ronnie and his amazing wife, Karen, decades ago in the Young Judaea Zionist Youth Movement.

A dazzling personality, both vital and ethereal, as well as a passionate Jew and perpetual seeker, Rabbi Cahana has never done small talk. He makes even the most casual interaction intense and intimate. Watching him with his congregants and his family is wondrous. His "How are you?" is never perfunctory. Rather, it's a sincere probe, asking whether you're getting the most out of your life, nurturing fulfilling relationships while benefiting from the kind of profound interaction he enjoys with Judaism and God.

Visiting the bedridden rabbi, you brace for heartbreak and emerge uplifted. He mouths words – or laboriously blinks them out. When no one can read his lips, he closes his eyes, and someone starts reciting "a, b, c…" He opens his eyes at the desired letter. The "Blinkischer Rebbe," as Karen calls him, blinks out stirring weekly sermons, greeting congregants from his "subterranean world," urging them to use the blow he sustained to experience life and Judaism in new dimensions.

"I know the end will be good," this rabbinic Stephen Hawking insists. "I did not lose anything. I gained."

All summer, Rabbi Cahana has bathed in his extraordinary family's love and laughter – he and Karen have five fabulous children, ages 14 to 23. Karen says it's hard to despair when he's so positive, when he delights in "feeling" every prayer for him, "visiting" with his late father, renewing his relationship to Judaism and God by painstakingly re-learning each mitzvah, bringing new meaning to each commandment.

On Tisha b'Av he fasted, demanding that his feeding tube be shut down. Every weekday morning, he puts on tfillin at the same time his congregants do.

"Finding spiritual paths in the hospital while vulnerable and fragile," he blinked to them, provides "a great delight of the day… I hear the tone, rhythm, the light banter, music and join you. I know our sounds and I listen to your voices. Our prayers are good and honest, and God looks favourably on the kind."

Currently, he can only wear the head phylacteries. This, he calls "the most healing of privileges. The retzuot [straps] course through the whole body… from the mind. Crown encircles the cranium. In the holiest of holies, the kesher, which we believe lies contiguously off of Hashem's holy kesher knot, sits on the brainstem to heal, to repair, to purify the world."

This year, I witnessed the miracles that can occur despite catastrophic brain trauma after my father took a serious fall and recovered remarkably. Rabbi Cahana has already progressed much faster than the doctors predicted. This Rosh Hashanah – as those who can rally around the Cahana family, bombarding them with the love and support they need – we should also learn from the Blinkischer Rebbe's teaching.

Let us follow him, temporarily, voluntarily, into the realm of the purely spiritual, the world of the soul, his transcendent universe of pure Jewish thought and emotion. And let us return less complacent and more compassionate, less tense and more intense, less alone and more loving, learning that whatever this next year brings, "the end will be good."

This year, more soul and less snicker

It's High Holiday time soon, and I often paraphrase a popular song to describe it: "Tis the season to be kvetchy."

The price of tickets is so high (and it's an outrage that there's even a price at all! I should be able to walk into any shul and have a seat, and there should be a rabbi and a cantor, a roof that doesn't leak, prayer books, chairs and a coat rack, and a cleaning person afterward – and all for free.) The rabbi spoke too long (or too politically or too religiously or too controversially or too timidly or whatever). The cantor sang too loud (or too high or too low or whatever). The people were overdressed (or in jeans or in fur or too showy or too casual or whatever). It was too long (it's never too short), too crowded, too hot, too cold, too much traffic on Bathurst, too early, too late, on a weekday, on a weekend, too far north, too far south.

It's never "just perfect."

Everything about the High Holidays seems to be such a big deal, except the actual meaning of the days themselves. The angst of these grievances clutters the mind and soul, and leaves little energy or room for being fully present in the drama of the holidays' themes: repentance, reconciliation and renewal.

The serenity prayer associated with 12-step recovery programs is instructive, and perhaps we should recite it upon entering the synagogue on Rosh Hashanah: "God, grant me the serenity to accept the things I cannot change, the courage to change the things I can, and the wisdom to know the difference."

Richard Carlson wrote a little book called Don't Sweat the Small Stuff… and It's All Small Stuff that's filled with practical suggestions on how to refocus our energy in positive directions.

Here are a few I think can help us during the High Holiday season.

Admit that nothing and no one is perfect. You're not perfect, nor are your spouse, friends, doctor, parents, rabbi and even your kids. Acknowledging the imperfection of your shul – or the service, rabbi or cantor – or your family will help you acknowledge your own imperfection and then start to dismantle it.

Second, put things on the back burner. Is it really imperative that you miss most of the service because you simply must have lunch on the table by 1 p.m.? Is it imperative that you comment now on the dress of the woman in front of you? Is it imperative that at this very moment of silent prayer you solve the "problem" of which app to buy for your new iPhone next week?

Third, resist the urge to criticize. Like that old joke about the hotels in the Catskills, "The food was terrible – and such small portions," we chip away at the beautiful in favour of the small and the insignificant. We love to criticize. We could well leave Rosh Hashanah services and not remember a single lovely thing about them.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

The Talmud reminds us to say every day, "Gam zeh ya'avor," "This too shall pass," whether "this" is something bad, or good. Don't sweat the small stuff, and it's all small stuff, unless something in the service offended every fibre of your moral being. It will pass, or you will change it, or you will change yourself and your situation so that it doesn't hurt you anymore.

Sweating the small stuff gives us a handy excuse, an easy way out of the really hard work of doing the three things that would, indeed, change our lives: repentance, reconciliation and renewal.

It's hard to apologize to someone you have hurt. It's easy to complain about the air conditioning. It's hard to make the leap you may need this year to get out of the wrong job, the wrong house, the wrong relationship or the wrong attitude. It's easy to grumble about how dry the honey cake was. It's hard to reconcile with a family member you haven't spoken to in years. It's easy to gossip about the strangers in the next row.

Because the themes of the High Holidays take so much inner strength, faith and courage, we'd rather sweat the small stuff than seriously sweat the big stuff. This year, can we all have more joy and less judgment, more passion and less pettiness, more soul and less snicker?

Ten years after 9-11, Al Qaeda has been weakened

Osama bin Laden would have been shocked, appalled and humbled had he known he was destined to be a deep-sea fish food treat. But that's exactly what happened to one of the world's greatest terrorists after he was assassinated by U.S. special forces in Pakistan on May 2, 10 years after masterminding the horrific events of Sept. 11, 2001 in the United States. After he was gunned down in his walled compound, his corpse, having been cleansed according to Islamic law, was transported to a U.S. naval vessel and then lowered into the depths of the Arabian Sea.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The killing of bin Laden, the climax of a decade-long manhunt launched in the rugged mountains of Afghanistan, was a landmark in the annals of the U.S. war on international terrorism. Bin Laden's death was doubtless a blow to the pan-Islamic movement he founded, but his passing did not spell finis to Al Qaeda or its affiliates in Pakistan and Yemen.

According to Michael Leiter, the former director of the National Counterterrorism Center, a major U.S. think tank based in Aspen, Colo., Al Qaeda continues to pose a threat to the United States.

The demise of bin Laden – a Saudi of Yemenite origin – was of the utmost importance, says Peter Bergen, a security analyst who closely followed his career and interviewed him in 1997.

In his latest book, The Longest War: The Enduring Conflict Between America and Al Qaeda (Free Press), which was published on the eve of bin Laden's assassination, Bergen writes that finding him was important for three reasons.

First, justice was served. Since 9-11, Al Qaeda has claimed thousands of victims around the world and is still plotting to pull off yet more acts of terrorism. Second, every day he remained at liberty was a propaganda victory for Al Qaeda. Third, he was a source of inspiration to his jihadist acolytes, having issued more than 30 videos and audio tapes since 9-11.

These messages, which reached millions through television, newspapers and the Internet, instructed followers to murder westerners, Israelis and Jews, kill American and coalition soldiers in Iraq and Afghanistan and sabotage Saudi Arabian oil facilities.

Until he was tracked down in Pakistan three months ago, the United States had not had a solid lead on his whereabouts since the battle of Tora Bora in the waning weeks of 2001. After the fall of Kabul in the wake of the U.S. invasion of Afghanistan, bin Laden and his confederates escaped to the eastern city of Jalalabad and then to the remote redoubt in Tora Bora.

U.S. aircraft bombed Tora Bora, killing some 220 militants and capturing 52 fighters, mostly Arabs, dozens of Afghans and a sprinkling of Chechens and Pakistanis. But bin Laden and his deputies escaped into neighbouring Pakistan.

In this deeply researched and incisive book, Bergen describes 9-11 as a brilliant success for Al Qaeda tactically. "Not since television viewers had watched the abduction and murder of Israeli athletes during the Munich Olympics in 1972 had a massive global audience witnessed a terrorist attack unfold in real time," he observes. "If Al Qaeda had been a largely unknown organization before 9-11, in the days after it became a household name."

He adds that while 9-11 brought Al Qaeda notoriety, it did not achieve its larger goals. The clash of civilizations bin Laden hoped to touch off did not materialize. The vast majority of Muslims considered 9-11 repugnant, and Muslim governments aligned themselves with the United States, the so-called infidel superpower.

"And so bin Laden's grand project – to transform the Muslim world into a militant Islamic caliphate – has been, by any measure, a resounding failure," Bergen observes.

Bin Laden, too, miscalculated the economic impact of 9-11 on the United States. Tr e, the repercussions cost Washington a whopping $500 billion. But in a $10-trillion economy, this represented a mere five per cent of U.S. gross domestic product.

Further, 9-11 boomeranged in terms of forcing a U.S. withdrawal from Muslim countries. After Sept. 11, the footprints of American troops could be seen not only in Afghanistan but in Iraq as well. And the United States' relationship with authoritarian Arab governments became stronger, given their shared distaste for Islamic radicalism.

Most obviously, Al Qaeda lost its strategic safe haven in Afghanistan with the collapse of the medieval Taliban regime.

Bergen acknowledges that Al Qaeda succeeded in reestablishing itself in Pakistan following the debacle in Afghanistan. "In a sense, Al Qaeda was just going home, since it was in the Pakistani city of Peshawar in 1988 that bin Laden had founded the group," he notes.

In the aftermath of 9-11, Bergen points out, the Pakistani megacity of Karachi, with a population of 15 million, emerged as a hub of jihadist violence. Al Qaeda formed a toxic alliance with Kashmiri extremists and Sunni fanatics – which had always been antagonistic to Pakistan's Shiite minority – and carried out a series of deadly attacks on Pakistani soil. The Jewish American journalist Daniel Pearl, a Wall Street Journal correspondent, was one of their hapless victims.

Yet since 9-11, Al Qaeda has been hammered in Pakistan, the ambivalence of Pakistan's government in battling Islamic radicalism notwithstanding.

And in Iraq, despite the best efforts of its leader, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, who was gunned down by the Americans, Al Qaeda has been hammered.

On a broader scale, Al Qaeda has lost the battle of ideas, Muslims having largely turned against the ideology of bin Ladenism, Bergen claims.

Although bin Laden was an inspiring figure in jihadist circles, he overreached, failing to appeal to a wider constituency.

Bin Laden was strongly motivated by the belief that Muslim lands were collectively humiliated by colonial western powers. He condemned the United States, in particular, for supporting pro-western Arab regimes and Israel.

Bergen rejects the notion that bin Laden, whom he brands as "a pathological antisemite," latched on to the issue of Israel only after 9-11: "Nothing could be further from the truth."

In 1996, in his first public declaration that he was at war with the United States, he likened the Arab loss of east Jerusalem in 1967 to "a burning fire in my intestines." Bin Laden also claimed that his hatred of the United States was fanned by Washington's decision to give Israel the green light to invade Lebanon in 1982.

The new U.S. secretary of defence, Leon Panetta, has said that the United States is "within reach of strategically defeating" Al Qaeda. There is an element of truth in his assertion. Al Qaeda has been pummelled and its ability to force decisive change has been compromised.

But Al Qaeda is still capable of dealing lethal blows, Bergen warns. As he puts it, "Like a snake backed into a corner, a weakened Al Qaeda is still dangerous."

The terrazzo floor in an open area on Shaarei Shomayim's lower level is gone after a burst water pipe pushed it straight up last week.

Shul's basement damaged by flood

Frances Kraft

A trickle of water was still seeping into the lower level of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation on Monday this week, following a Sept. 1 flood resulting from a broken water pipe. However, Rabbi Chaim Strauchler, the shul's spiritual leader, said damage has been less than expected.

He told The CJN Monday morning that the cause of the leak had been determined and underground repairs were expected to be completed that day, so that the synagogue could proceed with its own repairs once the building was dried out.

Offices have been relocated from the shul's lower level to two trailers in the parking lot. Also, about 50 children at Netivot HaTorah Day School's branch at the shul are being bused to its Thornhill location.

Shaarei Shomayim is committed to running all planned High Holiday services, Rabbi Strauchler said. He was optimistic that the services could be run on site.

Services in the main sanctuary have not been affected, and a post-flood wedding, bar mitzvah and barbecue also proceeded as planned.

The flood occurred when the main pipe supplying the shul's water from the City of Toronto burst at approximately 11 p.m., flooding Shaarei Shomayim's lower level with up to four inches of water while a wedding took place upstairs.

The force of the water pushed a terrazzo floor outside the lower level chapel straight up and raised it about a foot or more into the air, the rabbi said. "It was quite stunning."

Toronto Fire Services responded to a 911 call from the synagogue, and asked that the building be evacuated at 11:45 p.m.

The city was able to turn off the water at about 12:30 or 1 a.m., Rabbi Strauchler said.

Damaged items included stored parochets (curtains for the Torah ark) and books, a few of which may have to be buried in accordance with Jewish law if they are not salvageable.

The rabbi lauded the firefighters, who helped move Torahs and "did everything they could to save the synagogue as much damage as possible."

Fans and dehumidifiers have been running at the shul to circulate air and remove moisture.

The rabbi said there are no preliminary estimates of the extent of damage or repair costs.

Toronto youth support Israeli tent city protesters

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Jewish young people from Zionist organizations Hashomer Hatzair and Habonim Dror joined Baycrest residents to stand in solidarity with Israelis who have been protesting the high cost of living in Israel since July.

Held at the gazebos at the Baycrest Terraces on Sept. 8, about 30 people gathered for a "learn-in" during which they sat in groups to discuss the cause of the protests, which have brought nearly half a million Israelis into the streets to demand social change.

Carmi Daniel, director of Hashomer Hatzair Canada, led the event and said he hoped to raise awareness about the situation in Israel among Toronto's Jewish youth.

Prior to the "learn-in," the gathering heard from an Israeli social activist and protester, Ari Levy, who spoke via Skype about the cause.

Levy, a member of Dror Israel, an Israeli social justice movement and a participant in the tent city protests that have been taking place nationwide for the past two months, said the recent demonstrations have been the largest in Israel's history.

"At the climax, we had 450,000 people in the streets all over the country, which is eight per cent of the population… This is a protest that has an 86 per cent approval rating," Levy said.

Hashomer Hatzair members prepare a pop-up tent at the Baycrest Terraces in solidarity with tent-city protesters in Israel.

Israelis have been struggling due to the country's "process of privatization and shifting economic policies," he added.

While Israel's economy projected to grow by about five per cent this year, "the effect it has on the people of Israel has been getting worse and worse."

He added that "average salaries are also rising, but compared to the taxes that are placed on the goods, the food, the gas – the salaries are actually dropping."

In other words, despite a growing economy, the shekel isn't worth as much as it used to be.

"People started to realize – educated people, professional people – that they couldn't afford an apartment, they couldn't afford to start a family, they couldn't afford to finish the month with money in the bank."

In addition to calling on the government to address the shortage of affordable housing, protesters also demand fairer tax policies.

He explained that in Israel, indirect taxes, on items such as food and gas, are rising, and direct taxes, which come off a person's paycheque, are decreasing.

"We also want to slow down, if not stop, the process of privatization, which has been happening in Israeli society over the past 40 years."

Levy said the government also needs to invest more in the Israeli people.

"Israel finishes the fiscal year with a surplus, and that money doesn't go to social services and doesn't go toward helping people," he said, adding that investments in education, transportation, health care and other social services will help Israel economically in the long run.

As of last week, the tent cities throughout the country have started to be taken down, but Levy anticipates that there will be "more protesting for sure," and there are plans to move forward with Phase 2.

"We'll continue the protest as long as we need to, but it is important to understand that the goal of the struggle is actually to find a solution and promote real social justice," he said.

"Our purpose right now… is to raise awareness and to lobby public officials about our demands."

He said many people believe the protesters have an ulterior motive – to push Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu out of office.

"We are willing to work with anybody that wants to work together with us to bring real social and economic change to Israel," he said.

"We're happy to work with [Netanyahu]. And from my perspective, [our demands are] quite achievable."

He urged the gathering in Toronto – some of whom erected a tent near the Baycrest gazebos in solidarity with the protesters – to show their support by joining a Facebook group called "I support the social protest in Israel 2011," educate themselves about the situation and spread the word to others.

"This is not a political struggle and we don't have a political agenda. This is about social justice."

Candidates united in fighting hate crimes

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Ontario voters are not looking to rock the boat, says David Zimmer, the incumbent MPP for Willowdale, who was first elected in 2003.

Ontario Votes
Willowdale

"People are cranky about a lot of things, but they're looking at the alternative [to the Liberal party] and they want to stick with us," he said in a telephone interview.

Zimmer is running against Conservative candidate Vince Agovino, NDP candidate Alexander Brown, and Green Party candidate Michael Vettese.

Willowdale riding, with a Jewish population of about 9,050, is bounded by Steeles Avenue in the north, Highway 401 to the south, parts of Victoria Park Avenue, Finch Avenue and Leslie Street to the east, and by sections of the Don River and Bathurst Street before it loops back to Yonge Street in the west.

In the 2007 election, Zimmer beat PC candidate David Shiner by about 6,000 votes.

A lawyer by profession, Zimmer has served as chair of the Toronto Community Housing Corporation and assistant and deputy chair of the Immigration and Refugee Board of Canada. He's currently parliamentary assistant to the attorney general.

The Liberals are committed until 2018 to upload services such as social assistance and court security that had been downloaded to the municipalities under the Tories prior to 2003, he said. "[Municipalities] are concerned with the download of these services because it means raising taxes."

He said that hate crimes in Ontario are a non-partisan issue. "It goes without saying that all governments are appalled by hate crimes, and will do everything possible, including legislation, to stamp them out."

Zimmer said he took part in a trade mission to Israel with Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty in May 2010 and met with a number of high tech medical professionals at Weizmann Institute of Science and Hebrew University. "We have an Ontario-Israel joint plan to conduct research into brain issues. There is so much [both sides] can offer, that we should pool our resources.

Vince Agovino

"I understand that the premier is committed to repeat the trade mission in another sector," he said.

As for funding faith-based schools, Zimmer said it's not an issue the public will support.

Alexander Brown

"I think the position is the same as it was in 2007. We are adamant, though, in using tools to ensure that there is no discrimination, and that students are able to say prayers and practise their religion at school. Faith groups should be accommodated, not in the classroom, but by being given time to pray, and then returning to class."

Agovino, a Willowdale resident, opened a home care company servicing seniors, the disabled and those recovering from serious injuries, he said, after caring for his elderly grandparents and realizing how easy it is to fall through the cracks in the health-care system.

Michael Vettese

He has been campaigning since May and says people want change. "They are tired of their tax dollars being wasted, and they are concerned that the hydro bill is way too high."

Regarding Israel, Agovino said he fully supports Prime Minister Stephen Harper's policy. "Israel is a beacon of democracy in that region, and we need a strong relationship. Strong economic ties are good for both countries."

David Zimmer

Ontarians had an opportunity to voice their opinion on funding for faith-based schools in the 2007 vote, when then-Tory leader John Tory promised money for non-public schools and lost the election, "and they did so loud and clear. We will not revisit that issue."

Alexander Brown, the NDP candidate, is a teacher and career counsellor. He said he has received a good reception from Willowdale residents. "I've heard worries about the HST and high hydro bills."

Hate crimes against any group are unacceptable, he said, "and the solution comes down to education. Every community needs to be engaged in the education process."

NDP replaces controversial candidate

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The Ontario NDP replaced outspoken socialist candidate Barry Weisleder in the riding of Thornhill last week.

Barry Weisleder

Simon Strelchik

Weisleder, a Toronto substitute teacher and chair of the federal NDP's national socialist caucus, won the riding nomination on Sept. 1, defeating perennial NDP candidate Simon Strelchik at a riding association meeting.

But the win was negated a short time later when NDP provincial secretary Darlene Lawson rescinded his nomination.

Strelchik, who has run unsuccessfully in the riding for the NDP in the last three federal elections, was to be among the candidates at a second nomination meeting to be held on Sept. 11, said Ed Dale, the CFO of the riding association.

According to a Sept. 7 report in the National Post, Weisleder's nomination was revoked due to a failure to disclose important information on his nomination papers.

"All candidates have to fill out a disclosure form and when doing so you've got to be complete and you have to be truthful," Timmins-James Bay NDP MPP Gilles Bisson told the Post. "He did not do so, so we have withdrawn his candidacy from the party."

The nature of the undisclosed information hasn't been made public.

Weisleder told yorkregion.com that he plans to fight the decision and he considered the decision an "unjustifiable and a flagrant attack on party democracy." He said most of the Thornhill riding association backs his challenge.

Calls and e-mails from The CJN to the provincial NDP were not returned by deadline.

As a candidate in the riding that's said to have the largest proportion of Jewish voters in Canada, Weisleder's views on Israel may have played a role in his ouster.

In an undated post on the Socialist Action website, he criticized the Canadian government of supporting Israel's "Zionist apartheid" policies and of backing Israel's "military encirclement and starvation of Gaza's population to the present day."

Ontario Votes
Thornhill

The NDP isn't expected to win in Thornhill, where incumbent Tory MPP Peter Shurman is facing a high-profile challenger in former Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber, who is running for the Liberals.

A Thornhill all-candidates debate is planned for Sept. 20 at 7:30 p.m. at the Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto synagogue.

Green Party candidate Michael Vettese, 21, a biology student at University of Toronto, said his mission is to get young people voting.

"I am also concerned about the environment. There will be a crisis in the next few decades, and I'd like to do something about it at the polling station."

His party believes that the way to stop hate crimes is to teach students about the issue at a young age. "Teachers should be bringing up the subject even before they teach sex education. Spreading hate is a way of bullying, and it needs to be stopped."

Clarification

In the article, "Ex-mashgiach challenges COR overtime policy (CJN Aug. 18) regarding a lawsuit between the Kashruth Council of Canada and Morley Rand, The CJN wishes to further clarify that there is only one lawsuit before the Ontario Labour Relations Board. However, there are several issues being determined by the courts in this one case. Rand originated the suit with the Ontario Ministry of Labour while he was still employed by the Kashruth Council. Our original story implied that he filed that suit in retaliation for his dismissal.

This summer, Yaakov Green, a Grade 12 student at Yeshivat Or Chaim, combined his love for Israel with his love for science as the only Canadian participant in SciTech 2011, a scientific summer camp at the Technion – Israel Institute of Technology.

Along with a participant from London, England, Green worked with an Israeli Arab PhD student on her research project looking at the effects of the hormone angiotensin, which regulates salt balance and fluid balance in the body. They also wrote up the research and presented a poster on it at the end of the program.

Green felt 'cool about being a nerd'

Green spent about a week familiarizing himself with background material on the project before he left Toronto. "It was a totally unique opportunity," he said in a recent phone interview. "It was really amazing."

The 16-year-old was selected from the 44 participants to speak as student representative at graduation.

In his address – which was attended by mentors, faculty and guests, including Peretz Lavie, president of the university – Green said the SciTech experience was "uniquely challenging, fascinating and fun."

Where else, he asked, "can you feel cool about being a nerd?"

On a personal note, he added, he's always had a strong connection with Israel, citing the spirituality, culture and "life" as aspects he loves. He has spent a number of summers at a kibbutz sleepover camp there, most recently in 2010 as a counsellor.

Yaakov Green addresses fellow students, mentors, faculty and guests at the final assembly of the Technion's SciTech program for high school students.

"But never before have I been exposed to the side of Israel that it is so renowned for – its science," he added.

Green, who is thinking of a career in health sciences, credits his school for providing him with a good science education. "I love sciences," he said, adding that he finds anatomy particularly interesting.

He also liked the social and touring components of the Technion program, and the mix of people from places such as France, Serbia, Bulgaria, Italy and Israel. The latter group included Christian Arabs, Muslim Arabs and recent olim from Russia, he noted.

"Everybody had a great time," Green said. "It was interesting to meet all these different people and hear about their countries, cultures and outlooks. It was a huge learning experience for me."

Make a difference. Impact the future.
Leave a legacy.

"My message is quite simple. If you believe as a Jew, you must believe in the continuum that is the Jewish people. And you must believe in your obligation that we as a people must live and strive and grow for the future. We have survived for over 5,000 years, regardless of the efforts to destroy us. And yet we continue. In every generation, there are stories of horror that can be told. And yet, because of our commitment to each other and our strong bonds of community, we have managed to survive, adapt and continue to flourish. Each generation has its story, each has its successes, and each generation has been built on the foundation created by previous generations." – Sheryl Bernett, z"l

CIJA accuses PA of using UN as a cover

That is, they will (wrongly) accuse Israel of occupying a sovereign country – thus adding momentum to the boycott-divestment-sanctions campaign."

Additionally, the document warns that the Palestinian leadership has already begun inciting Palestinians to "take to the streets" before and after the vote, which may lead to more violence in the region.

Shimon Fogel

CIJA also accuses the PA of using the United Nations "as a cover" to violate its signed international treaties with Israel, namely UN resolutions 242, 338 and the 1993 Oslo accords, all of which call for direct talks between the two parties as the only method of solving the conflict.

"The current move by the Palestinian leadership is aimed at creating a state without peace with Israel – and as such is a prescription for permanent violence," according to the CIJA document.

Asked how the message will be disseminated to reach different target groups in the community, such as Jewish students on campus – where anti-Israel and anti-semitic animus has become widespread –Fogel said CIJA will spread its UDI message on a national scale.

"We take core messaging and customize it for particular audiences who we're seeking to engage," Fogel said. "So this [UDI] messaging will be articulated to the political sector in customized product [form] for them. Similarly, the messaging will go on campus, adjusted for them, just as it goes to our community, to media and so forth."

Fogel said while there was still a small chance the Palestinians might take the resolution off the table at the United Nations, that would only happen if the Americans or other parties presented a "sufficiently compelling" alternative to PA President Mahmoud Abbas to allow him to "climb down from his tree."

Absent that, the Palestinian resolution would "go forward for sure," he said.

"The Palestinian Authority has refused to enter into direct talks since the fall of 2010, effectively abandoning peace negotiations," CIJA stated on its website. "Today, Canada, along with the United States and a number of European countries (Germany, Italy, and the Netherlands – amongst others), opposes Mr. Abbas' effort at the UN as counterproductive to the cause of peace and Palestinian statehood.

"One cannot unilaterally declare peace. The Palestinian Authority must immediately return to direct talks with Israel, in order to negotiate a peace agreement which will serve as the foundation of a Palestinian state."

In comments to The CJN on the subject earlier this year, Prime Minister Stephen Harper affirmed his opposition to a Palestinian unilateral declaration of independence.

"If the Palestinian Authority wants to obtain sovereignty, the way to do that is through negotiation. A unilateral declaration will ultimately be unsuccessful," he said

Even on Mexico vacation, boycott debate looms large

Recently, my family and I were travelling in Oaxaca, Mexico — a place about as far away from Middle East politics as one might think, so I assumed. Then one evening, walking through the cobblestone streets of the old city, I came across a wonderful looking artist's hangout, the Café Lobo Azul (the Blue Wolf Café).

Judging by the majority of the patrons, intently bent over their Macs, it appeared to be somewhat of an intellectual hub. I peered farther into one of the oversize windows of the renovated single-storey 19th-century colonial building, and my eye was immediately drawn to a large poster of an Israeli flag, overlaid with the word "Boycott."

Oren Safdie

Rattled — but also curious — I entered the café and saw that every wall in the establishment was decorated with a political cause, ranging from a rendered portrait of Che Guevara to "Free Libya!" The owner was obviously up to date. Yet, a noticeable majority of the posters were devoted to Israel's "crimes against humanity" and to the occupation of Palestine.

I inched my way to the back and found a young, pleasant-looking Mexican man in his mid 40s, wearing cargo pants and a knitted Rasta cap. He seemed a little more authoritative than the other waiters and waitresses, and I asked him who the owner of the establishment was.

"Why, I am!" he proudly declared. "Mind if I ask you about one of your posters?" I inquired.

"Of course, of course," he replied, as if explaining the stories behind his acquisitions were the best part of his job.

I walked him over to the "Boycott Israel" poster, now framed by a couple of Australian backpackers who had just seated themselves, taking advantage of the free Wi-Fi, and asked him if he understood that to a Jew, the word "Boycott" next to a Star of David is loaded with historical implications. He shrugged his shoulders. I then asked him why he would advocate for the collective punishment against the citizens of Israel while at the same time feature another poster, a few walls down, that chastised Israel for collectively punishing the citizens of Gaza. Dismissing the comparison, he proudly stated that he, in fact, had been to Gaza and, furthermore, several young Israelis and Jewish travellers who had passed through his café had complimented him on his stance — in effect, giving him the protection he needed to feel comfortable countering criticism from people like me.

Before I left the café, I told him that I hoped he'd never have to experience being boycotted himself, but I could see that my words were too abstract to be taken as anything more than wild-eyed prophesy. I returned to my hotel room, confused as to why I was taking it so personally. After all, it's not as if the call to boycott Israel is an anomaly these days, or that there's any shortage of malcontented Jews and Israelis publicly attacking the policies of the present government. Still, there was something about this remote place, at this pivotal time, as well the casualness and ease with which such a poster was hung up, that felt alarming — almost as if, if it could happen in Oaxaca, it could happen everywhere.

Upon returning to my hotel room, I described the experience to my wife and daughter, and at one point jokingly said that I should go down to the café and stand outside the door with a boycott sign so that the knows how it feels.

Half an hour later, with a couple of pieces of cardboard, my daughter and I parked ourselves outside the Café Lobo Azul, holding up our "Boycott" signs (with little further explanation), making passers-by feel uneasy as they entered, or occasionally decided not to enter, the café. It was a busy street on a Friday night, and no doubt a little girl and her gringo father attracted quite a bit of attention. We marched for only half an hour, and the economic impact on the establishment was minimal. That wasn't my intention. But for a short while, I saw the owner quite concerned, his staff darting out to the sidewalk to see if our protest was having any effect.

Although I have no idea whether the poster remains hanging there today, I feel satisfied that not only was I able to make the owner understand the seriousness of his call to action, but, hopefully, I also instilled a lesson in my daughter that it is not enough to remain passive in the face of a world that will most likely grow more hostile toward Jews in the coming years.

With all the debate going back and forth regarding the passage of the new law in the Israeli Knesset, which penalizes those in Israel who call for the boycott of a fellow countryman's products or specific region, it's important to remember that the law does not take away one's ability to choose what one buys or does not buy; it merely gives the boycottees some deserved protection. Otherwise, what would stop people like my daughter and myself from closing down a number of legitimate businesses because their politics didn't mesh with our own?

Perhaps, more important, the cafés of the world — and numerous other institutions, trade unions and governments — will not be able to take cover from the knowledge that Israel's own citizens are doing the same, and they certainly won't be able to differentiate between a farmer in the West Bank, a baker in Jerusalem's Jewish Quarter or a waiter working in a coffee shop in Tel Aviv.

31st Annual Holocaust Education Week runs from November 1 to 9

Opening Night features "The Eichmann Trial: A Perspective After 50 Years"

By Daniel Horowitz

In May of 1960, SS Lieutenant Colonel Adolf Eichmann was captured by Israel agents in Argentina.

His subsequent trial in Jerusalem by an Israeli court electrified the world. The public debate it sparked on where, how, and by whom Nazi war criminals should be brought to justice, and the international media coverage of the trial itself, was a watershed moment in how the civilized world in general and Holocaust survivors in particular, found the means to deal with the legacy of genocide on a scale that had never been seen before.

The trial also brought to the public's consciousness another important factor when speaking about those who - either directly or indirectly – contributed to the death of six million innocents – accountability.

So, it's appropriate that, this year, as we commemorate the 50 year anniversary of the Eichmann trial, "Accountability" is the theme of the upcoming 31st annual Holocaust Education Week (HEW), presented by UJA Federation's Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre.

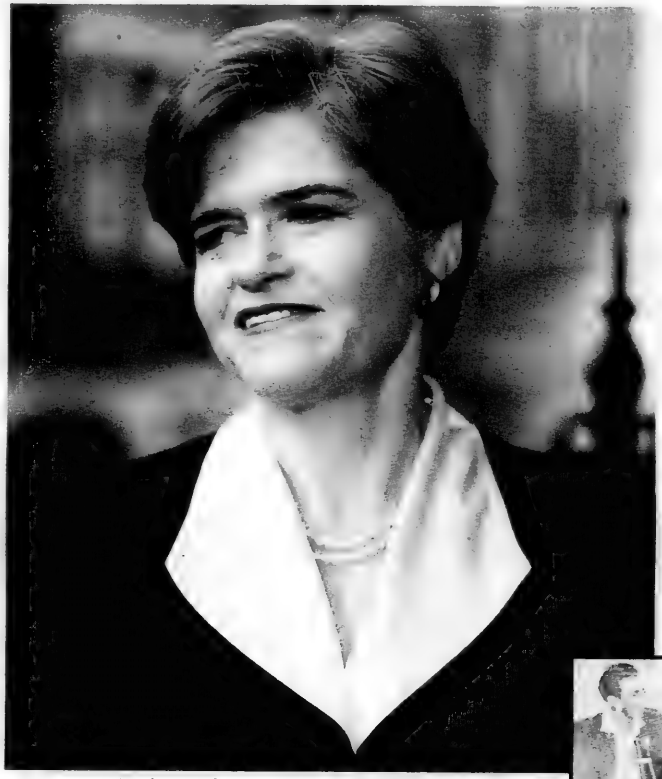
This year's HEW, chaired by Joyce Rifkind and Annette Metz-Pivnick, will offer approximately 130 no-charge, fascinating, educational programs across the Greater Toronto Area and in smaller Jewish communities across Ontario.

The official media sponsors of HEW 2011 - which runs from November 1 to 9 – are CTV and the National Post. CTV's CP24 won the Adrienne Clarkson Award for Diversity for their coverage of HEW in 2010.

"Holocaust Education Week is one of the most important and vital collaborative events that our community organizes," says UJA Federation President & CEO, Ted Sokolsky. "As the years go by, this event continues to educate both young and old on the harrowing experiences of the past, while instilling the importance of ridding society of the evils of hatred, bigotry and intolerance. We trust that this year's Holocaust Education Week program inspires our community to continue to support our work and stand up for humane values and respect for the inherent dignity of all."

"This year marks the 50th anniversary of a pivotal moment in the history of Holocaust remembrance, not only the Eichmann trial but the horrific testimony of approximately 100 survivors whose words and memories reach us from that courtroom a half century ago," says Metz-Pivnick. "Holocaust Education Week 2011 is an opportunity to reflect on the issue of moral responsibility past and present."

Opening Night will take place on Tuesday, November 1 at Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple and will feature award-winning historian Deborah E. Lipstadt, the Director of the Rabbi Donald A. Tam Institute for Jewish Studies and Dorot Professor of Modern Jewish and Holocaust Studies at Emory University, Atlanta. She is the author of Denying the Holocaust (1993) and The Eichmann Trial (2011). In 1996, British Holocaust denier David Irving sued Lipstadt for alleged libel. Three courts found for Lipstadt concluding that Irving was a Holocaust denier, an antisemite and a racist.



Award-winning historian and author Deborah E. Lipstadt

Dr. Lipstadt will provide an overview of the trial and analyze the dramatic effect that the survivors' courtroom testimony had on a world that had until then regularly commemorated the Holocaust but never fully understood what the millions who died and the hundreds of thousands who managed to survive, had actually experienced.

Dr. Lipstadt will be introduced by HEW Scholar-in-Residence, Dr. Michael R. Marrus, Chancellor Rose and Ray Wolfe Professor Emeritus of Holocaust Studies at the University of Toronto.

"The theme of accountability for HEW resonates for all time and for all places," says Rifkind. "We are all accountable for our behaviour no matter when the action occurred. In light of those who would deny the Holocaust, it is important that we continue to educate people and hold those responsible and those who stood by to be accountable for their behavior."

The Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre, chaired by Honey Sherman, is dedicated to preserving the memories of the victims, honouring the legacies of those who survived and educating the community so that the Holocaust will serve as a warning to future generations about the dangers of antisemitism, racism, intolerance and apathy.

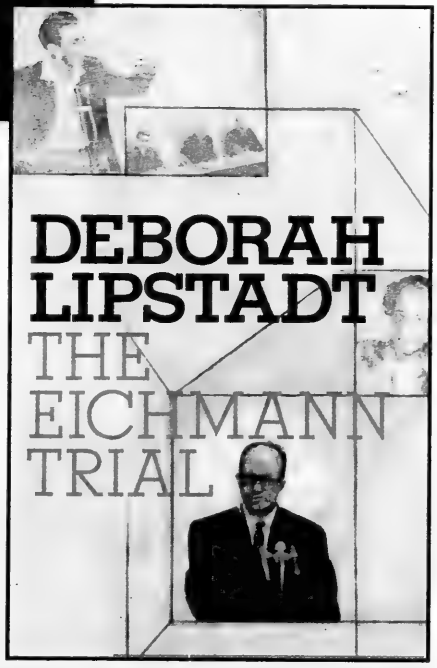
Led by Executive Director Mira Goldfarb, the Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre engages over 70,000 students, educators and members of the public through a vast array of programs and events each year. In its much larger future home in the Jewish Museum of Canada, the Centre will launch a world-class array of new programming, exhibitions and resources.

"As the daughter of Holocaust survivors, I am honoured to chair UJA's Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre, which presents Holocaust Education Week," says Sherman. "With each passing year, our responsibility to teach younger generations the horrors of the Shoah, and the dangers of racism, intolerance and hate grow."

Honey and Barry Sherman, along with Elizabeth and Tony Comper, founders of FAST (Fighting Antisemitism Together), are lead sponsors of HEW 2011. FAST is a coalition of non-Jews dedicated to funding education and projects that encourage non-Jews to speak out.

Indeed, accountability is incumbent upon us all.

For more information about HEW and for a searchable calendar of multi-disciplinary programs, many of which feature Holocaust survivor speakers, and a list of participating bookstores with HEW program brochures, visit www.holocausteducationweek.com or call 416.631.5689.



Kurds are true friends of Israel

I am from the Middle East, but I do not celebrate the recent uprisings and regime changes. It's good to see Arabs topple their dictators, but I worry that their revolution today may harm the existing democracy that is Israel tomorrow. If Arab demonstrations can add new democracies to the region, I will welcome it, but I feel that some of them want to overthrow their regimes in order to get a free hand to wage war against Israel at some point.

People may wonder why I care about Israel, and my reply is because we have a lot in common with the people of that country. I am a Kurd from Iraqi Kurdistan, and as far back as I can remember, we have been repressed, tortured, killed, bombed and gassed by the same countries that vow to destroy Israel. In just one day, former Iraqi president Saddam Hussein's army killed 5,000 innocent men, women and children in my town, Halabja, with chemical bombs in 1988. The Syrian regime denies the existence of hundreds of thousands of Kurds in Syria, and for the past three decades, there hasn't been a day in which the Islamic regime in Iran hasn't executed a Kurdish man or woman.

Israel is the only democracy in the Middle East, and for us, the Kurds, who do not have our own state, Israel is a source of inspiration. We genuinely believe the Jewish people deserve a state of their own, and I would want our state, if we one day have one, to be modelled after Israel rather than any of our neighbours.

Our neighbours are police states where citizens are detained, tortured and killed with impunity. Their dictators can give and take away life as they wish, and any voice of dissent is mercilessly silenced. But when I look at Israel and see a country where politicians, no matter how high-ranking are brought to court for any wrongdoing, where people can criticize their government without fear, where the press is free, I can't help worrying about its future.

I cannot celebrate the fall of Egypt's Hosni Mubarak or Tunisia's Zine El Abidine Ben Ali when I see protesters shouting resentful slogans at Israel as if it was Israel that repressed and jailed them. It may skip the attention of many westerners, but if you know Arabic and see the protesters' banners, you would be surprised to find out how much of these demonstrations are about Israel.

Ayub Nuri

I believe that Israel's friendly relations with some of its neighbours, such as Egypt and Jordan, has always been fragile. Most people in those two countries dream about the demise of the Jewish state. Every Arab state – not just Egypt and Jordan – could have peace treaty with Israel, but as long as their peoples are hostile toward the Jewish state, it would be nothing but fragile peace.

Turkey is another example. The alliance between Israel and Turkey has unfortunately, and rightly so, estranged millions of Kurds who have lived there for years. Turkey is a deeply religious country, and its good relations with the Jewish state for so many years only came about because secular military generals used to run that country. Now with an Islamic party in charge, no other country in the region has shown more animosity toward Israel in the past few years than Turkey.

The Kurds, on the other hand, are extremely friendly toward Israel. Unlike Arab countries whose leaders sign treaties with Israel while their people seethe with anger, in Kurdistan, people and government alike have deep respect for the Jewish people and their faith. In Kurdistan, people speak nostalgically, with tearful eyes and sorrowful hearts, about their old Jewish neighbours. In Europe or America, it may be the law that stops the expression of anti-Jewish sentiment, but in Kurdistan, it is genuine sympathy that makes almost everyone friendly toward Israel.

In any Muslim country, you would easily find people who would happily volunteer to join an army that may one day invade Israel, but in Kurdistan, you would find many people who wouldn't hesitate to join the Israeli army to repel any such attack. Kurds are victims of genocide, centuries of persecution and displacement. That's why we understand and relate to the Jewish cause better than anybody else.

I was walking one day in a market in Kurdistan with a Palestinian colleague who lives in Europe. At one point, we stopped to buy some dried figs and nuts, and when the shopkeeper learned that my colleague was a Palestinian, he immediately turned to her and said, "Please leave Israel alone. Stop firing rockets at them."

Once I was travelling from Baghdad to Kurdistan and the passenger next to me in the taxi was an old Kurdish man. He had been enlisted in the Iraqi army in 1956 and sent to the Israeli front in Jordan. He said his fellow Arab soldiers used to castigate him for not wanting to shoot at the Israelis. He would say to them, "It is not my war. I have nothing against the Jews."

This kinship between the Kurds and the Jews is not new. Only recently did I see in the Dead Sea Scrolls the story of Tobit, who advises his sons to pack up and go to Media because they would be safe there. And guess what? The third line of the Kurdish national anthem says, "We are the children of the Media."

The Middle East is an island on which the Jews and Kurds are stranded. In order to survive, we have to stay together. The direction our region is heading draws us closer to each other. No matter how bleak the future of the region may look, Kurdistan and the Jewish state will survive by holding on to each other.

Ayub Nuri is a Kurdish journalist from Halabja in Iraqi Kurdistan. He is editor-in-chief of the newspaper Rudaw, but this article reflects his own views only.

"Terrorists rarely kill for money... but they always need money to kill."

We can stop the flow of blood by stopping the flow of money

Terrorist organizations receive billions of dollars of support from states, organizations and individuals. But those who supply this funding are rarely prosecuted successfully.

We can change that – by changing the law and supporting the passage of the Justice for Victims of Terrorism Act.

This bill is expected to be introduced shortly in the House of Commons. It will allow Canadian terror victims to launch civil suits against state and local sponsors of terror in Canadian courts.

Civil suits of this sort can hold terror sponsors accountable by allowing seizure of their assets; exposing them to public scrutiny and preventing them from accessing Canada's financial system.

Prime Minister Harper, MPs from all parties, and leading Canadian jurists have supported the passage of this type of legislation.

Canadian terror victims are asking for your help. Please contact your MPs - tell them this measure must be enacted without further delay.

A time for new beginnings

One grey February day, as my daughter and I sipped on some frothy hot chocolate at a local coffee shop, a ruggedly handsome man, Bruno Roder, sat beside us and we started to chat.

After a half hour of shmoozing, we got up to leave and I noticed that he was wearing a Star of David around his neck. I looked at him quizzically, searching for any recognizable sign of Jewishness, which, of course, only a Jew can do. I tried to camouflage my startled look by blabbering on about his necklace. This pleased Roder, as he had only recently found out that he was Jewish.

As a writer and as a Jew, I was intrigued. "How did Roder feel about this discovery? What would he do with this newfound knowledge?" We exchanged e-mails hopeful to connect in the near future, but two years passed until Roder would share his story with me.

Shortly after Roder turned 50, he experienced a personal awakening of epic proportion. His mother, Blanche Roder, who was gravely ill at the time, finally unveiled the family secret to her son, one that she fiercely guarded for most of her life.

Initially, Roder's reaction was one of complete disbelief, but when he searched his sister's eyes for clarification, he soon realized that he was the only one in the family who wasn't aware of this startling fact. And his mother's words continued to flow, "I'm Jewish, my mother was Jewish and our Jewish roots go back generations."

Perhaps these words finally spoken were a relief for Blanche or rather still, a heavy burden. But for Roder, the words were welcome and sweet, offering explanation of the forever unanswered questions and the absence of aunts, uncles and cousins.

" It was as if all the pieces that didn't fit in my life had suddenly come together. I feel like I missed out on a lot, " Roder explains.

Born in Mantes-la-Jolie, France, in 1959, to Tibor Roder and Blanche Kantorowicz, Roder, his older sister Diana, and their parents made their way to Canada in 1965. The Roder family identified as Roman Catholics, but aside from having a Christmas tree, they did not adhere to any religious practices.

Blanche lived in Paris with her mother, Anna, during World War II. At the age of eight, Blanche was sent to live on a farm in the French countryside until the age of 16. This was a horrific time for Blanche, as the farmer beat her and she suffered greatly from being separated from her mother. Roder heard his mother talk about this difficult time, but now realizes that his grandmother's decision to send his mother away was most likely intended to save her life, as she was Jewish.

Roder's maternal grandparents and great-grandparents were Polish Jews. His grandmother, Anna, was a lieutenant for the French Resistance, who slept with Nazis in exchange for information. After the war, Anna joined her daughter and son-in-law in Canada, but never spoke of her past.

Roder remembers growing up in Mississauga, Ont., with only non-Jewish friends, and joining in on the antisemitic banter in the schoolyard. He had not knowingly met a Jew in his life, yet he was surrounded by them at home.

I couldn't help but reflect on my own life and my connection to Judaism. Whether I loved every second of Hebrew school or not, or was more interested in the boys at synagogue than the rabbi's sermon, living a Jewish life, although not an observant one, provided comfort and a strong sense of belonging.

With both of Roder's parents now deceased – Roder's father was also Jewish – and little known of any of his surviving cousins, he is left with bits and pieces, trying to reconstruct his history. Roder is only now beginning to understand the fear and horrors that his parents must have witnessed and endured in antisemitic Europe, and the need to protect their children from any potential threat.

"I know very little about Judaism, but I want to know more," says Roder.

I also wanted him to know more. I quickly assembled the quintessential Judaism kit for Roder, enclosing a copy of Hana's Suitcase by Karen Levine – simple but poignant – and Night by Elie Wiesel, the first book I read about the atrocities of the Holocaust. I even threw in a braided challah for Roder's very first Sabbath. I was on a roll, and my mission was to help this grown man discover the joys of Judaism whether he wanted to or not.

As luck would have it, a few weeks after I reconnected with Roder, I was introduced to Rabbi Levi Gansburg from Chabad York Mills, while he was donning an electric-orange Hawaiian shirt at a Purim party. I cornered the rabbi and told him about Roder, determined that this newly minted Jew learn about being a Jew straight from the source. With a tinkle in his eye, Rabbi Gansburg handed me his business card. A few weeks later, the three of us met.

Getting business out of the way, Rabbi Gansburg first inquired about Roder's lineage, making sure that he was in fact certifiably "kosher" and born to a fully Jewish mother. "Whew," he passed the test, and I sighed with relief.

" If you're Jewish, you have a Jewish soul. Even if you never do anything about it, there's a spark," Rabbi Gansburg lovingly explained.

Roder smiled, watching Rabbi Gansburg talk about the beauty of Judaism. Although there was no "aha" moment that I could see, Roder seemed at ease in this new setting. I, on the other hand, was surprisingly overwhelmed with emotion, and tried my best to conceal the tears pooling in my eyes. Rabbi Gansburg, beaming with joy, lovingly helped Roder perform the Jewish tradition of laying tfillin, an important symbol of being Jewish. I swiftly pulled out my BlackBerry to photograph this moment, a testament to the present and the living.

Shofar teachings from Rav Kook

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl

Two teachings of Rabbi Abraham Yitzchak Kook about the shofar have implications for our personal lives, the condition of Jews in the Diaspora and Israel's current situation. Rabbi Kook (1865–1935) the first Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Palestine, was a religious thinker, legal authority, mystic and poet who had a major impact on 20th-century Jewish thought.

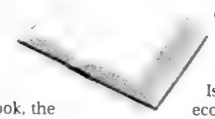
Rosh Hashanah is described as a "day of truah blasts" and the Talmud debates whether the truah blast is similar to the groan of one pained by regret or like the wail of a person in extreme distress. We have a custom to sound both types of blasts and to fuse the two sounds to create shvarim-truah, a combination of groans and weeping.

Rabbi Kook taught that the blasts aim to create a spiritual response in us, so the combination of blasts calls to both the head and heart, balances intellectual reflection and powerful emotion, and draws on the strengths of passion and intellect.

For many Jews, attachment to our tradition stems from emotion and deep memories. Others are attracted by our tradition of study and intellectual debate. Some have a visceral and passionate connection to Israel. They're moved by the mythical state that has risen from the ashes to the "start-up nation." Many young people take its security for granted and want it to emphasize a just and democratic society. As with tshuvah and personal growth, the balance of passion and perspective, miracle and mundane, will build a more enduring and substantive bond with Israel.

In addition to the sounds of shvarim-truah, three short blasts followed by nine staccato blows, the other shofar blast is tekiah, a long, constant blast. The blasts are organized in sets consisting of a long blast, a combination of broken and staccato blasts, and another long blast.

Rabbinic Reflections



According to Rabbi Kook, the order of the blasts on Rosh Hashanah corresponds to the words, "The Eternal reigns, the Eternal reigned, the Eternal will reign forever." The first tekiah represents "The Eternal reigned," referring to Divine sovereignty in the beginning of time. In the end of days, a redemptive tekiah will be heard and the world will experience "the Eternal will reign forever."

But between the two tekiah blasts is a complex series of notes representing a world challenged to attain the ideal of "the Eternal reigns." Our complicated condition is represented by the "broken" shvarim and the "wobbly" truah blasts, a time of instability and indecision, an era of "advance and return." Rabbi Kook suggests that those who are able to rise above the uncertainty and confusion of life will "walk in the light of [God's] Presence." They have the faith to believe that, in the future, "the Eternal will reign forever."

We live in a time of confusion regarding personal and social morality, a time of Jewish security and anxiety, a time when Israel is strong yet vulnerable. Previous certainties of behaviour are questioned and challenged. Jews are accepted in all areas of society, yet we see a return of the "oldest hatred" in Europe and Israel being singled out for calumny and criticism. Eighteen years after Oslo, Israel has experienced economic development and continued uncertainty about the prospects of peace. Palestinian leaders intent on unilateral declarations of independence refuse to negotiate. What once seemed "true and certain" is now questioned.

Rabbi Kook's teachings remind us to stay faithful to the ultimate triumph of divine sovereignty and to draw on inner Jewish strength in this time of uncertainty, confusion and hardship. We're called to be resolute in the pursuit of a negotiated peace, to re-assert personal and communal Jewish dignity and to re-affirm the values and traditions that bring us closer to God.

Baruch Frydman-Kohl is spiritual leader of Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto.

Roman Israel part II(The Galil)

Sepphoris, or Zippori as it is known in Hebrew, was called the Jewel of the Galilee. Although it was destroyed by the Roman legate Varus (who would later lose his life and three Roman legions in the Battle of the Teutoberg Forest, thus ending Rome's attempt to conquer Germany and altering the future course of history in the process), the city would rise from the ashes like a phoenix.

Sepphoris became the Roman capital of the Galilee. Some people feel that it's the city referred to by Jesus when he said that a city on a hill cannot be hidden. Adding to its Christian connections is the traditional belief that it is the home of Mary's parents, Anna and Joachim.

In the 1980s, it was excavated by Eric and Carol Meyers of Duke University and James F. Strange of the University of South Florida. They found evidence of a fascinating site with a multi-layered past stretching back centuries. In the first few centuries of the Common Era, it was a cosmopolitan city boasting a Roman theatre. The excavators dug up some beautiful mosaics, the best known of which was dubbed "the Mona Lisa of the Galilee." This lovely mosaic even made an appearance at the Canadian National Exhibition in Toronto a few years ago, where it was the star display at the Israeli pavilion.

But Sepphoris, or Zippori, to call it by its Hebrew name, would also become a centre of Jewish learning, especially after the second Jewish revolt against Rome led by the charismatic Simon Bar Kochba, who also lent his name to the rebellion.

Past Forward

Alex Gropper

After this revolt, many Jewish refugees settled in the city, making it a centre of Jewish scholarship. Among them was Rabbi Yehuda Hanasi, one of the compilers of the Mishnah. It even became the home of the Sanhedrin for a while.

Not far from Sepphoris/Zippori is another important Galilean site dating to the Roman period that has been the focus of major archaeological excavations for many decades. Its Hebrew name is Kfar Nahum, but it's known in English as Capernaum.

Capernaum is best known for its association with Jesus and the apostles. As a result, it has been undergoing continuous archeological excavations since the early 20th century. Recent digs by the Dominicans, sponsored by the Italian government, have revealed a flourishing settlement from the so-called intertestamental period. Archeologists have found synagogues dating to the early centuries of the Common Era, as well as churches from the same period.

During this time, Christianity became the official religion of the Roman Empire, in the early fourth century CE. Dating even earlier, from the first century, the Dominican excavators claimed to have found the home of the apostle Peter, citing graffiti that supposedly mentioned his name. Indeed the site was important enough to have been visited by Pope John Paul II, when he visited Israel in 2000.

Atonement at any age

The High Holidays are just around the corner, and we're asking the same questions we ask every year. Do I have to go to shul? Who is eating which meal where? Can I wear the same thing I wore last year? How will I manage if the shul doesn't let me save seats?

It's interesting that when the High Holidays are still a few months away, we can more easily raise different questions – heartfelt questions of sin and repentance, questions about God and our spiritual relationships, questions about our soul and our doubts. Yet somehow our focus becomes quite narrow as the holidays get closer. This doesn't represent a decline in our religious commitment. Rather, it's a nod to the practical.

We cannot keep a level of intensity about the greater questions of life and God indefinitely. At some point, life is going to happen. Jewishly, life should happen. Judaism isn't a religion that teaches that in order to find true happiness and peace, we must go to the mountain and "be" the mountain. On the contrary, we must figure out how to bring the proverbial mountain to us so that we find happiness and peace while interacting with the world and repairing as we go.

Our thoughts turn to shul because they need to. The spiritual side of everything is done inside, privately between ourselves and God. But we still have to model to our children that one of the reasons we go to shul is to build community. We model that it does matter what we wear, because we're showing respect for our place of prayer, our community and our relationship with God. In fact, with so few places requiring a dress code these days, this is actually an incredible opportunity to model such a thing.

Midrashic Moments

Rachael Turkienicz

The Torah has charged parents with the foundational commandment "teach your children," and this becomes a lifelong commandment. We're never able to complete it, since there's always something new to learn, something innovative to model. Getting on in years isn't a reason to interact less with our children, but in fact a greater challenge for us as to how to teach them. It's an active commandment, not a passive one. If we can't think of something new to bring to them, we're not looking hard enough.

The lessons we've learned throughout our lives become moments of choice when the same situation arises again. The years we're granted help us to put closure on the mistakes of our youth. But more than that, it's also the time we can use our life lessons to teach our children, small or grown, so that they have more information than we did. The challenge is that most grown children don't want to remain students, so we must make ourselves better teachers.

The midrash says: "Happy our old age, which has atoned for our youth." I certainly use my experience and age to atone for mistakes of my youth. However, I also use my experience and age to teach Jewish youth to make better choices. I guide them through atonement by teaching them how to avoid the problem in the first place.

The High Holidays are about my spirituality, my practical life and how I can make sure I leave the world better than I found it. That is true atonement.

Rachael Turkienicz is director of Rachael's Centre.

Honey cake: some respect, please

Question: Which of these is not an ancient Rosh Hashanah food: black-eyed peas, leeks, spinach, dates, honey cake, carrots, gourds or sheep's heads?

Answer: Honey cake (believe it or not!).

All of them (except for honey cake) are part of the Rosh Hashanah "seder". These foods have names in Hebrew (or Yiddish) that are reminiscent of – or even puns of – good omens for the Jewish people. For example, before we eat carrots at the Rosh Hashanah table, we traditionally ask "that our merits increase" because carrot in Yiddish is 'mehren' which can also mean 'to increase.'" [http://bit.ly/hnycake6]

But just because honey cake may not be an "official" Rosh Hashanah food doesn't mean that it shouldn't have a special place on our tables – and in our stomachs – come the New Year.

So how did honey cake find its way onto our holiday table? Leah Zeldes explains in ChicagoDining.com. "Honey cakes, perhaps baked by Jewish slaves, were among the sacrifices sealed into the tombs of the pharaohs. Basboosa, a honey-drenched Middle Eastern cake made from semolina, is likely closer to the original." [http://bit.ly/hnycake2]

Leah Koenig writes in Forward.com that the first Jewish honey cakes (or lekach, which comes from the German word lecke, meaning "lick") originated in Germany in the Middle Ages. "During this period, the dessert was primarily eaten on Purim and Shavuot and sometimes served as a treat for young yeshiva students… From Germany, the dish travelled to eastern Europe, where Jews celebrated with honey cakes at simchot (happy occasions) and holidays alike. According to [food writer Gil] Marks, the overall use of honey as an ingredient declined in eastern European cooking during the 17th century, but remained popular in Jewish cuisine." [http://bit.ly/hnycake7]

And of course, honey is no stranger to the festive Rosh Hashanah table as we wish each other a good and sweet year. [http://bit.ly/hnycake8]

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

Truth be told, as you scour the web about honey cake, you realize that many people wouldn't place it in the Jewish culinary pantheon alongside latkes, hamantashen and cheesecake.

As Susan Weissman puts it (bluntly) in the Huffington Post, "Nobody I know likes honey cake all that much. Including myself. Unless you count my mother… Still, every Jewish New Year, in addition to securing temple seats, planning family gatherings and holiday fare, many of us begin plotting honey cake in a subconscious desire to make that particular dessert tastier." [http://bit.ly/hnycake9]

So what's the problem? There are several, depending on whom you ask:

- Susan Schwartz of the Montreal Gazette: "It often tastes dry as dust or else way too oily, for one, and recipes often call for cloves and allspice – two spices that, to my mind, easily overpower a dish." [http://bit.ly/hnycake3]
- Food writer Marcy Goldman: "Most honey is just sweet; it lacks rich honey flavour." [http://bit.ly/hnycake10]
- "Food maven" Arthur Schwartz: "I hate the rubbery texture of most honey cakes." [http://bit.ly/hnycake5]
- Deb Perelman of smittenkitchen.com: "They were dry and never sweet enough. They were coarse and totally unloved… This life is too short to eat terrible cake." [http://bit.ly/hnycake4]

Next time: in pursuit of the perfect honey cake.

The more activity the better

Fitness Corner

Felyce Zomparelli

How much activity is necessary for heart protection? Canadian physical activity guidelines suggest that adults aged 18 and older should participate in at least 150 minutes of moderate aerobic physical activity per week, in bouts of 10 minutes or more. It also recommends two rounds a week of muscle- and bone-strengthening activities.

A new study published in Circulation, an American Heart and Stroke publication, examined the benefit of exercise on heart disease as it relates to the physical activity guidelines.

To get a better understanding of how much exercise is needed to achieve a benefit, researchers analyzed 33 studies on exercise and heart disease going back to 1995. The studies measured how frequently participants exercised and the duration of their exercise, and followed them for more than a decade. The results showed that the more physical activity you do, the more continuous improvement in your health and the more protection against heart disease.

Participants who exercised according to the minimum guidelines (150 minutes a week, or 30 minutes a day of moderate exercise for five out of seven days) had a 14 per cent lower risk of heart disease then those who didn't exercise at all.

Those who doubled the recommended minimum activity levels to one hour a day lowered their risk of heart disease by 20 per cent. Even participants who only exercised at half the rate recommended by the minimum guidelines received some heart protection over non-exercisers.

This research proves that adding little bursts of physical activity during your day can really improve your health. Activities such as walking the dog, taking the stairs at work instead of the elevator or taking a few 10-minute walks to break up your day can add up and over time improve the quality of your life.

The more physical activity you do the greater the health benefits. People at risk of heart disease and not used to moderate exercise should take it slow and consult their doctor before starting any physical activity program.

$1.7M raised for Hope & Cope

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — The 30th anniversary of Hope & Cope was recently celebrated at the Soirée Fantastique, a gala evening held at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim, which raised $1.7 million for the cancer patient support program at the Jewish General Hospital (JGH).

Legendary composer, pianist and conductor Marvin Hamlisch and child prodigy Ethan Bortnick shared the stage, entertaining a who's who of business and community leaders who support the Friends of Hope & Cope.

After welcoming remarks by Hope & Cope co-president Jeannette Valmont (on behalf of her co-president, Serena Black) and the event's co-chairs Heleena Wiltzer and Pauline Segel, guests watched the première of a video produced for the milestone anniversary.

Wellness Centre participants, Hope & Cope volunteers and JGH oncology staff spoke poignantly about the profound impact of Hope & Cope on patients and their families, as well as its contribution to the smooth functioning of oncology services at the hospital.

Sheila Kussner, Hope & Cope founder and chair, reflected on how far the organization has come, from its humble beginnings with a handful of volunteers to its current status as an international role model in volunteer-based cancer care.

Soirée Fantastique proceeds will support Hope & Cope's wide variety of programs and services at all of its sites, from the oncology and radiotherapy clinics and palliative care unit at the JGH to the off-site Wellness Centre, also known as Lou's House. Managed by Hope & Cope, the centre is an oasis for cancer patients during and immediately following treatment.

I want to thank my family, relatives, friends and associates for all your affection, support and good wishes and to wish you all
a very happy, healthy New Year.

With much love,

Ina Gurofsky

A TRIBUTE "TO LIFE"
(A tribute to L'Chaim Retirement Residence from the Bendel and Kramer families)

This is a tribute to L'Chaim Retirement Residence and it's staff, to honor the memory of our mother, Sophie Bendel, (Alav Hashalom). Mom spent the last nine and a half years of her life at L'Chaim, making it her home.

Shortly after the L'Chaim Retirement Residence opened in 2001, our Mom became a resident. On July 26, 2011, she passed away at the home six weeks short of her 100th birthday. For ten years our Mother's life was enriched by her interactions with the staff and residents of this special place The expanded family we became a part of, enhanced our lives as well.

For children and grandchildren, the loss of a mother and grandmother is always a sad event regardless of age. It was evident that our Mom's passing was as grievous for the staff at L'Chaim as it was for all of us.

Mom thrived in an environment of warmth and loving care provided by the dedicated management and staff. Although she suffered several serious medical setbacks over the years, each time she was released from hospital, she was nursed back to health at L'Chaim. Contributing to her longevity and quality of life was the extraordinary care she received during those times.

Mom was constantly encouraged to participate in the daily programming and special events designed to stimulate her both mentally and physically. She enjoyed sharing these moments with everyone, which always brought a smile to her face. Her experience was not unique, yet seemed to be typical of the dedication exhibited by this group of Personal Care Staff Workers towards all the residents of L'Chaim.

The Care at L'Chaim is outstanding, but the Caring is immeasurable.

We will be forever grateful for their professionalism, warmth and kindness and we are sincerely grateful to the L'Chaim management and staff for making our Mother's last years so happy and meaningful.

Thank you so much - Judy, Esther, Evelyn, Babbsie, and Lerma (chef extraordinaire.) who were with Mom from day one. Also our thanks to Amy, Elad and the entire staff.
Gertie Kramer and Sheldon Bendel

Radio-Canada defends reference to Palestine

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Société Radio-Canada has defended a game show in which Jerusalem was designated as a city in "Palestine."

In reponse to a complaint from the pro-Israel media watchdog HonestReportingCanada, the public broadcaster's audience relations department wrote that the show Connivence is "a game show, not a news or current affairs program... The question was asked in a religious context ("holy cities" category). We regret if you saw it as having a political connotation."

Radio-Canada included the response of the outside producer of the daytime show.

The French-language reference sources used to formulate the question were La Petit Larousse illustré 2010 and Dixel: Le Dictionnaire illustré 2011 (Le Robert), wrote Ginette Gaulin, director of business and legal affairs for B.U.B.B.L.E.S. Television.

On the Aug. 12 episode, contestants were asked: "What city in Palestine is a well-known pilgrimage site for Christians, Jews and Muslims?"

The correct answer was "Jerusalem."

Gaulin included a photocopy of the two references. Larousse defines Jerusalem as "v. de Palestine... Ville sainte de Palestine et lieu de pèlerinage pour les chrétiens, les juifs et les musulmans" – "a city of Palestine... a holy city of Palestine and a place of pilgrimage for Christians, Jews and Muslims."

Similarly Dixel's definition is "Ville de Palestine...cité sainte pour les religions juive, chrétienne et musulmane" – "a city of Palestine... a holy city for the Jewish, Christians and Muslim religions."

HonestReporting Canada wasn't satisfied with the response and wants a correction.

"While Connivence is a game show produced by a third party and not an information/news program, Radio-Canada is still responsible for the content that is broadcast on its airwaves, regardless of the nature of the program," said HonestReporting's executive director Mike Fegelman.

He also noted that both of the sources cited by B.U.B.B.L.E.S. also include the fact that Jerusalem was proclaimed the capital of Israel in 1980.

Fegelman said he thinks Radio-Canada, the French-language arm of CBC, should make an on-air rectification in keeping with its own ethical standards of accuracy and neutrality.

Scholars plead for peace

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The killing of "innocent people" in the name of any religion is unacceptable, controversial Muslim academic Tariq Ramadan said at an international conference held in Montreal Sept. 7 to mark the 10th anniversary of 9-11.

All religions must face up to the violence within their traditions, Ramadan, an Oxford University professor of contemporary Islamic studies, said during the second World's Religions After September 11 conference on the theme of "Peace Through Religion."

"If we avoid the subject of violence, we will never get peace," he said at a press conference prior to the daylong symposium organized by McGill University in co-operation with the Université de Montréal.

He urged Muslims to do "their moral duty and say no to those talking [of violence] in the name of your religion."

He contended that violence is an intrinsic aspect of human nature and that peace is "not a natural state" for anyone and can only be achieved through self-discipline.

He also said criticism of Islam is not necessarily "Islamophobia," but may be "a legitimate part of freedom of speech," if it is not motivated by racism or xenophobia.

Ramadan was denied admission to the United States from September 2006 until January 2010, when a federal appeals court ruled in favour of his receiving a visa. The State Department reversed its earlier conclusion that Ramadan was inadmissible because he had made donations to organizations linked to Hamas, of which he denied any knowledge.

On the other hand, Ramadan continues to be persona non grata in a number of autocratic Arab countries for his criticism of their denial of basic human rights. Religious voices should be addressing the "corruption, poverty and injustice" that plagues the Arab world and prevents peace, he said. Ramadan urged the media to report it when religious moderates speak out or people of different faiths come together in common purpose, and "not only terrorist attacks."

Joining Ramadan at the press conference and on a panel discussion during the conference itself was Prof. Steven Katz, director of the Elie Wiesel Center for Judaic Studies at Boston University and former chair of the U.S. Holocaust Museum's academic committee.

Holder of the Alvin J. and Shirley Slater Chair in Jewish and Holocaust Studies, Katz was the main representative of Judaism at the conference, which drew more than 2,000 participants.

New Ottawa shul caters to young professionals

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — There's a new kid on the block in the Jewish community, and "community" is the key word.

The Glebe Shul is a synagogue without walls that began its official programming last month. Named for the neighbourhood where founders Rabbi Michael and Stacy Goldstein live, the shul is really more of a Shabbat gathering at their home.

The idea for the Glebe Shul evolved from informal Friday night dinners and davening at the Goldsteins' home. Rabbi Goldstein grew up in Ottawa but the past few years have taken him to Israel, New York and Toronto.

Last summer, he returned to Ottawa with his bride, Stacy, to take over the young professionals division of JET (Jewish Education through Torah), a local outreach organization. In addition to their part-time work with JET, Rabbi Goldstein is a social worker at Jewish Family Services and Stacy is a chiropractor.

The regular, bi-weekly Shabbat dinners at their home are a JET program to provide a warm, inviting Shabbat experience for young, Jewish professionals, many of whom are new to the city and may not have family or a friend network in place.

"Most guests grew up in Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg or Vancouver and have moved to Ottawa for work or school. They are looking for community in their new city, and they are drawn to the strong Glebe Shul community," said Rabbi Goldstein.

Stacy and Michael Goldstein

There is no plan to hold regular weekly Shabbat or holiday services, and the Glebe Shul isn't planning to compete with traditional synagogues. They meet only on Friday nights, so many members attend services elsewhere.

Plans for the new shul include member-driven educational and volunteer activities. The Goldsteins hope to be the facilitators for members' ideas and to create opportunities for people to develop the kind of Jewish community they're looking for.

Adam Moscoe is one of the participants who hopes to help plan some social action projects. A couple of ideas he has suggested are an urban gardening project and something incorporating eco-kashrut.

Entering his third year of undergraduate studies in psychology at the University of Ottawa, Moscoe says he's the youngest person involved in the Glebe Shul, which comprises mostly graduate students and young professionals.

"It's always interesting attending the Shabbat dinners, because there's such a good mix of people. Last week they had 40 people and managed to fit everyone into their house," Moscoe said. "It's fun that people go a few days beforehand and help with the cooking and preparations."

Although the Glebe Shul is a new initiative, JET has been organizing innovative programming in Ottawa for many years.

"It is particularly meaningful for me to be working with JET, an organization that was instrumental in my family's Jewish journey more than 20 years ago. I grew up in JET programs. I believe in their mission and it's a privilege for me to be able to contribute towards that environment," said Rabbi Goldstein.

Headlines stress different parts of Palmer Report

News judgment is always an interesting, if occasionally bewildering, part of the media's craft. If a story has several parts, what, in the judgment of reporters and editors, should constitute the lead and grab the headlines?

Stories on Sept. 2 about the findings of the Palmer Commission, which investigated the events surrounding Israel's seizure last year of the Gaza-bound Turkish ship Mavi Mamara, provide a revealing glimpse into this aspect of journalism.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Compare, for instance, the following headlines from the world sections of Canada's two national newspapers: "Israel attack on flotilla 'excessive': UN report" (National Post); "UN report finds Israeli naval blockade legal, but raid flawed" (Globe and Mail). While the subheading in the Post noted that the blockade is legal, the headline is what grabs attention, sets the tone and leaves an immediate impression. Here, the contrast could not be more stark.

Significantly, both papers ran basically the same New York Times story, which began as follows: "A UN review has found that Israel's naval blockade of Gaza is legal and appropriate, but that the way its forces boarded a Turkish-based flotilla trying to break that blockade 15 months ago, killing nine passengers, was excessive and unreasonable."

The Globe chose to reflect mainly the first part of the opening passage, while the Post focused on the latter part. Why is there such a discrepancy?

What about the Times itself? That paper went with the headline "UN Faults Israel On Flotilla Raid, Not On Blockade" with "Policy Is Called Legal" being the first sub-heading. Strangely, the Times own headline reverses the order of the opening passage in the story, which gives priority to the raid's legality.

It's not until the third paragraph of the Times story, carried in both the Globe and Post, that the Palmer Report's charge appears, noting that the force used was "excessive." But why focus then, in the headline, on this one aspect, as the Post did? Is this just a sloppy error, or does it perhaps reflect the misunderstanding or even the leanings of a copy editor? Whatever the case, the impact of headlines on readers (who may not have time to digest the whole story) is without a doubt telling and deserves careful attention.

The Mavi Marmara

Some analysts have argued that the Palmer Report struck a "balance" between criticism of Turkey and Israel, a sort of balance reflected in the New York Times headline.

But that claim isn't backed up by the story in the Times itself, which reflected the fact that the report largely exonerates Israel of the many charges levelled against it after the Mavi Marmara incident. Foremost among these is that Israel's naval blockade of Gaza and its seizure of the ship in international waters were both "illegal." (That Israel was largely exonerated by a commission convened by the UN is arguably the story of the day.)

In fact, the Palmer Report noted that "Israel faces a real threat to its security from militant groups in Gaza. The naval blockade was imposed as a legitimate security measure." It also noted that the flotilla "acted recklessly" in attempting to breach the blockade; it strongly suggested that some of the organizers, "particularly IHH" (an Islamic group from Turkey), encouraged this with violent objectives, and it acknowledged that Israeli commandos faced "organized and violent resistance from a group of passengers... requiring them to use force for their own protection."

These essential details were captured by the National Post in an excellent Sept. 3 editorial, which defended Israel's decision to refuse Turkey's brazen demand that it formally apologize for the Turkish activists killed aboard the Mavi Mamara. This is something Israel has already expressed regret over but, as the Post argued, has no reason to apologize for.

Is it any wonder that Israel accepted the Palmer Report (although disagreeing with the "excessive" force charge), while Turkey immediately rejected the report in full?

Students warned about hostile campus climate

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies president and CEO Avi Benlolo warned parents and their university-bound children last week about a campus climate that's hostile to pro-Israel students.

During a presentation titled, "Has the Intifadah Come to Canada?" held at the FSWC's offices in Toronto, Benlolo delivered a presentation to drive home "the reality of what's going on on campus."

He said the anti-Israel sentiments on campus go beyond Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW), an annual series of events that began in 2005 at the University of Toronto and has since spread to more than 40 cities around the world.

"It's no longer just a week. It goes on throughout the year. There are many, many events," he said to a group that included about 20 concerned parents, students, Jewish community professionals, as well as former federal Thornhill Liberal candidate Karen Mock, who headed the Canadian Race Relations Foundation from 2001 to 2005.

Benlolo added that York University is one of FSWC's main concerns, despite the feeling by some that the hostilities between pro-Israeli and pro-Palestinian students have subsided.

"A lot of it, quite frankly, is the community itself getting used to the situation and saying now this is something that we have to adapt to," Benlolo said.

"But this is something we shouldn't have to adapt to. This is not normal for university students to go to school and feel intimidated, and not want to wear their Magen David, and not write pro-Israel essays and papers because they're afraid of what their TAs or professors will say."

He said some of the posters and signs displayed on campuses during IAW and anti-Israel demonstrations are hateful and antisemitic.

One of the images Benlolo used as an example was a depiction of Holocaust victim Anne Frank wearing a keffiyah, a symbol of the Palestinian resistance.

"This is where it becomes antisemitic. If you want to talk about social issues, if you want to talk about human rights issues, fine. No problem. You want to talk about Palestinians having their own state, that's perfectly fine… but to get down and dirty and antisemitic and to wrap the word Palestine in barbed wire that signifies Auschwitz – this is the reality of what's going on on campus."

He said a slogan he often sees on signs during anti-Israel demonstrations is "Palestine will be free, from the river to the sea."

"I don't know what you call that, but I call that ethnic cleansing. It's those kinds of hateful, genocidal innuendos that are disconcerting. That is being permitted on university campuses," Benlolo said.

He said that messages like that are not considered hate speech, because "they play it smart, and they're careful with their language, but everyone understands it… Unless they say, 'kill every Jew,' it's not hate speech."

Avi Benlolo

Although many university administrators say they are powerless to stop anti-Israel events from taking place on campus, Benlolo praised Carleton University for its decision to ban a poster the administration felt was "inflammatory."

In 2009, Students Against Israeli Apartheid put up 100 posters throughout Carleton that depicted a helicopter labelled "Israel" firing a missile at a teddy bear-holding toddler labelled "Gaza."

The Carleton administration, led by president Roseann O'Reilly Runte, banned the posters from campus on the grounds that it "could incite infringements of the Ontario Human Rights Code."

Benlolo said she was "unbelievably bullied. She had students sitting down in front of her office. She told me on the phone that she was scared to walk to her car, if you would believe."

Isaac Apter, a U of T graduate who attended the FSWC presentation, shared his experience of having been assaulted when he challenged a speaker at an IAW lecture in 2009.

He said one of the ushers grabbed him by the back of the neck and yelled at him to "shut the f--k up."

He said university administrators must stop looking at the tensions on campus as an ethnic conflict.

"I think someone needs to kind of give them a knock on the head so they realize it's not just bickering, it's not just arguing. It's deeper than that," Apter said.

Mock, who spoke after the presentation during a question-and-answer period, said efforts must be made to marginalize the small minority of extremists.

"We need to empower the majority of people who don't want this to happen," Mock said.

"Our students who want to speak up need to be empowered and meet with the 95 per cent of the students who are Muslim and Arab who think that these people are jerks. But they are silenced, too, because they are also afraid."

Benlolo said a big part of the problem is that many Jewish students are entering universities unprepared for the hostile climate.

"In large part, many of the students we've spoken to don't feel articulate enough to confront the issue on university campuses," he said.

Unfortunately, he added, anti-Israel sentiments are also permeating the general population.

He referred to the Al Quds Day Rally, held Aug. 28 at Queen's Park during which Zionists were called "racist," "inhuman," and "barbarians," and that Israel itself was a cancer.

"The rhetoric is becoming much more vicious, much more unacceptable, and much more dangerous," Benlolo said.

"Israel is not perfect. There is discrimination. There are problems, as we all know, and there are also problems here in Canada," but he added, that doesn't mean that Israel should be compared to an apartheid state.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Kosher meal plan introduced at WLU

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Wilfrid Laurier University students who keep kosher no longer have to shop for food off campus or settle for vegetarian options at the cafeteria.

As of this year, the Waterloo, Ont., school will provide its growing number of Jewish students kosher options on campus.

Sam Konig, Hillel Canada's national director, said when parents began calling him to inquire about kosher meal plans at Ontario universities, he reached out to local Hillel offices to come up with a solution.

"As universities are reaching out to diverse groups, they have to be able to cater to them," Konig said.

Jessica Kronis, director of Hillel Waterloo, said she approached the team at Wilfrid Laurier's food services department and connected them with a kosher food distributer called For Lovers of Food.

Kronis said that the food service staff "was very excited when we talked to them about the contact that we had, and they were very enthusiastic to get it going. They mentioned they had been receiving calls from students, and that this is exactly what they were looking for."

Kronis, who also works with Jewish students at the University of Waterloo, estimates that there are about 1,500 to 1,600 Jewish undergraduate and graduate students at both schools.

Heidi Singer

She estimated that about 800 to 900 of those students attend Wilfrid Laurier.

"The numbers are significant, and they are growing," Konig said, adding that more Jewish students are choosing schools outside the Greater Toronto Area.

"This is about accommodating the demand, but also creating a demand. We know that all the Jewish students are not kosher, but in the same way that you would want to have vegetarian options, or gluten-free, kosher is another option."

Kronis said Waterloo hasn't yet made the jump to providing kosher food to students, but she'll continue to reach out to the administration at that university.

Other Ontario schools, including the University of Guelph and Queen's University, offer kosher food.

Heidi Singer, a 20-year-old Wilfrid Laurier political science student said she just started keeping kosher last year.

Singer said that, other than meat and cheese, it wasn't too difficult to find kosher food off campus, and friends and family from Toronto were always willing to bring kosher care packages when they came to visit.

But on a social level, it was challenging.

"It's not easy, especially when all your friends want to go out and order amazing-looking nachos that you can't have. But you can always order a drink, and most beer is kosher," Singer said.

Singer said she's excited that her campus offers kosher options.

"It means I can actually join my friends when they want to get food on campus, and sometimes it's exciting to go out to eat," she said.

"I think it's important for students who are considering keeping kosher but haven't done so because they feel it may be too hard. Having kosher food on campus shows that anything is possible, and you won't be totally outcast if you choose to keep this mitzvah."

Konig said that in addition to accomodating the growing number of Jewish students attending schools outside the GTA, bringing kosher food to campuses can also "educate people around us about what kosher is. It's a good learning opportunity for everyone. It's not just about meeting the needs of the Jewish students, but in general a good thing to have on campus."

Konig said Hillel will continue to work with universities who are interested in providing kosher options.

"Kosher food doesn't have to mean gefilte fish and cholent. It can mean a regular turkey sandwich," he said.

Kronis said she's encouraged that many schools are recognizing the need to cater to their diverse student body by creating a more inclusive environment.

"We're really happy that the universities are starting to recognize that creating an inclusive environment, not just in the student union area, but in the cafeteria [is important]," Kronis said.

"Universities should be proud to boast this diversity."

Rosh Hashanah dishes feature wholesome foods

Norene Gilletz
Special to The CJN

Moroccan-born Levana Kirschenbaum's passion for wholesome foods will inspire you to change the way you cook and eat today. Her newest cookbook, The Whole Foods Kosher Kitchen: Glorious Meals Pure and Simple (Skyhorse Publishing, $14.95,) contains a treasure trove of simple, scrumptious recipes made with pure, simple ingredients. Levana shares her enthusiasm for healthy, down-to-earth dishes that will fill you with energy and keep you looking and feeling young. Eating right has never been simpler.

A cookbook author and cooking teacher, Levana Kirschenbaum, was co-owner of Levana Restaurant in Manhattan's Upper West Side and a pioneer in kosher upscale dining. She considers The Whole Foods Kosher Kitchen to be a culmination of her life's work.

Levana emphasizes eating whole foods that are unprocessed and unrefined, thereby keeping all their nutrients intact. From appetizers to desserts, you'll find 350 delicious recipes that call for simple, uncomplicated ingredients: Moroccan Pea Soup ("made with yellow split peas because children are more attracted to yellow food than green food"), Chicken with Apples, Unstuffed Cabbage, Vegetable and Dried Fruit Couscous, Quinoa Tabbouleh, Lasagna with Roasted Vegetables, Cold Sesame Noodles, Chocolate Espresso Mousse… and especially for Rosh Hashanah, her moist and spicy Honey Cake.

The Whole Foods Kosher Kitchen includes not one, but three indexes: general, gluten-free and Passover. The cookbook is packed with tips for healthy living from nutritionist Lisa Young, with colour photographs by Meir Pliskin. For more information, visit Levana's website at www.levanacooks.com.

When entertaining guests, Levana suggests: "Create a reasonable and not overly complicated menu, reflecting your own personal style and creativity rather than the latest food fads. Do not try too many new dishes at one meal. If you are a novice or unadventurous, remember that you can never go wrong with the classics. Let me confess that after all my years of cooking and hosting, a meal of classic favourites is the one that gets me the most hugs from my family."

I asked Levana to recommend some of her favourite recipes for the upcoming High Holidays. Levana suggested preparing any of the following dishes, "but not all at the same meal." The dishes she suggested represent some of the simanim, symbolic foods that are traditional for Rosh Hashanah, including fish, apples, pomegranates, carrots and honey, all enhanced by Levana's special flair for healthy, fabulous fare.

Best wishes to all for a sweet, delicious and healthy New Year!

1/2 cup millet (or other quick-cooking grain: steel-cut oats, teff, amaranth, etc.)
1 tsp. allspice
2 tsp. cinnamon
1 tbsp. orange zest
salt to taste
freshly ground pepper to taste

Heat the oil in heavy pot. In a food processor, coarsely grind the onions and add to the hot oil. Reduce the flame to medium and fry, stirring occasionally, until very dark brown. This step will take about 20 minutes.

Add the ginger and curry and cook, stirring, 2 more minutes. Add all but last two ingredients. Bring to a boil. Reduce the flame to medium and cook covered for 30 minutes. Adjust the texture and seasonings.

Makes a dozen ample servings

Nutrition Tip: Carrots are a good source of fibre, which helps to maintain bowel health, lower blood cholesterol, and aid in weight maintenance. The orange pigment found in carrots is due to the antioxidant, beta-carotene, also found in other deep orange foods such as sweet potatoes, pumpkin, butternut squash, papaya, and cantaloupe. Beta-carotene is converted to vitamin A in the body, and helps to maintain healthy eyes, support your immune system, keep your skin healthy, and protect against certain cancers.

SALMON IN POMEGRANATE SWEET-AND-SOUR SAUCE
Gluten free, Passover

Sweet-and-sour combinations work beautifully with salmon. The onions caramelize and contribute a sweet counterpoint to the vinegar. Another quick and delicious dish, just the way I like it – one pan, one step.

1 whole side salmon, no skin, no bones, about 3 1/2 pounds, trimmed
1 large red onion, sliced very thin (use the food processor)
1/4 cup olive oil
1 cup pomegranate juice
1/4 cup unfiltered apple cider vinegar
2 tbsp. tomato paste
salt and pepper to taste
1 tsp. turmeric

Preheat the oven to 425. Place the salmon in a pan just large enough to accommodate the fish in one layer. Scatter the onions on top and on the sides of the fish. Mix the oil, juice, vinegar, tomato paste, salt, pepper and turmeric in a bowl, and pour over the fish.

Cook about 20 minutes, or a tiny bit more until the fish flakes easily and the liquids thicken. Serve hot or at room temperature.

Makes 8 main course servings or a dozen or more first course servings

HOT AND SWEET PARSNIPS

Gluten free. Passover

Poor parsnips often get discarded (as in chicken soup) but who knew they could be so fabulous?

1 1/2 dozen very thin parsnips, peeled and left whole (settle for 5-6 larger ones, peeled and quartered lengthwise)
2 cups water
3 tbsp. olive oil
3 tbsp. sugar or Sucanat
1 tbsp. paprika
1 tsp. turmeric
1/2 tsp. cayenne pepper, or less to taste
1 tbsp. ground cinnamon
salt and pepper to taste

Place all the ingredients in a wide heavy pot and bring to a boil. Reduce the heat to medium, cover, and cook for 20 minutes, or longer until the parsnips are tender and the liquids in the pot have thickened. Pour the sauce over the parsnips. Serve hot or at room temperature. Makes 8 servings.

Nutrition Tip: Parsnips, a once overlooked vegetable, contain a significant amount of fibre as well as vitamins such as the B vitamin folate and vitamin C.

LEVANA'S HONEY CAKE

Honey cake is the traditional cake of the Jewish New Year, but you will be making it year-round: It's that good! I actually succeed in turning quite a few people onto my honey cake. Mine is moist and spicy and easy to love; I trust it will make you forget all the indignities of past dried-out and brittle honey cakes. I make it several ways, all scrumptious, but this is one of my favourites. The secret ingredient, orange marmalade, was shared by my dear friend Leah.

1 cup oil
2/3 cup sugar
1 cup dark honey
1 cup orange marmalade (homemade or store-bought)
4 eggs
3/4 cup strong coffee at room temperature
3 tbsp. rum or brandy
3 cups flour: all-purpose, whole wheat pastry, or spelt
2 tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. baking soda
good pinch salt
1 tsp. each cinnamon, allspice and ginger
1/2 cup sliced almonds (optional)

Preheat the oven to 350. Mix the oil, sugar, honey, marmalade, eggs, coffee and brandy in a food processor.

In a bowl, mix together the flour, baking powder, baking soda, salt, cinnamon and allspice. Add in 3 additions to the egg mixture, using the pulse button, mixing each time only until combined. If you are adding the almonds, fold them in by hand with a spoon.

Pour the batter into a greased tube pan, or 11- x 14-inch pan and bake 1 hour, or a little longer until a knife inserted in the center comes out clean. Invert on a rack to cool. Makes 16 ample servings.

Meaty mains for Rosh Hashanah

Daphna Rabinovitch
Special to The CJN

After spending three weeks in Israel this past summer, I realized that I could happily live off salads and hummus forever. However, then I came home (unfortunately everyone has to at some point!) and started thinking about all the occasions when I love to entertain.

Salads, no matter how filling, colourful and satisfying, simply don't always fit the bill, especially in our northern climates when one's appetite yearns for dishes that are meaty and hearty, particularly as the temperature dips. Rosh Hashanah falls this year smack dab at the end of September, when the days still glow with late summer sun but the nights can catch your breath with their fall chill.

I've prepared three main courses for your Rosh Hashanah celebrations that I am confident will warm your guests, tempt them to come back for seconds and inspire you to enjoy all your own preparations in the kitchen. They all tend to themselves over the stove or in the oven, bubbling away, tenderizing the meat, freeing you up to all the other things that must get done. Better yet, most of these dishes taste better the next day after the flavours have had a chance to get to know each other well.

BRAISED SHORT RIBS WITH ORANGE AND GINGER

2 tbsp. vegetable oil
5 lb. meaty beef short ribs
1 onion, finely chopped
3 cloves garlic, minced
1/4 cup minced fresh gingerroot
3/4 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. each pepper and hot pepper flakes
3 tbsp. grated orange rind
1 1/4 cup orange juice
1/2 cup beef stock
1/2 cup tomato paste
2 tbsp. honey

Preheat oven to 300. In large, heavy bottomed saucepan, heat oil over medium heat. Add short ribs, in batches, browning well on both sides. Transfer to roasting pan.

Add onions, garlic, gingerroot, hot pepper flakes, salt and pepper to pot. Cook, stirring, for three minutes. Pour in orange rind and juice, stock, tomato paste and honey. Bring to boil, scraping up any browned bits from bottom of pan. Pour liquid over ribs in pan. Cover well with tin foil.

Bake in centre of preheated oven for two hours, basting with juices once halfway through.

Reduce heat to 250. Turn ribs, basting well with liquid. Bake, covered, for 1 hour or until meat is fall off the bone tender. Let cool for 1/2 hour. Refrigerate overnight or for up to two days.

Skim off congealed fat. Pour liquid into saucepan. Bring to boil. Boil lightly for 10 minutes or until slightly reduced. Pour back over ribs. Reheat in 300 oven for 1/2 hour. Makes 6 servings.

Chicken soup? Just follow the recipe

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

With the holidays just days away, I am now in culinary training. I made chicken soup last week and I'll be making another pot in a couple of days. I'm honing my chicken soup skills just in case my mother can't make it to Toronto, or she arrives here late for the holidays. You could say that in my family, I'm the chicken soup understudy.

In my family, everyone has a role at the holiday dinners. My mother makes her amazing soup and the salad, my sister takes care of the main course and the sides, my brother concocts some sort of vegetarian dish and I bring dessert.

I don't actually prepare the dessert. My mother and my sister – the executive chefs, so to speak – prefer that I find a store-bought cake. It's not that I can't cook or bake. Over the years I've had plenty of successes in the kitchen, but the results are inconsistent.

The problem is that I can never stick to a recipe, and for every culinary hit, there are plenty of misses.

I always start out with good intentions. But somewhere in the process, I may add or substitute an ingredient. And one deviation often leads to another. Inevitably, the recipe becomes an exercise in kitchen alchemy with very unpredictable results.

It's for this reason that my culinary exploits have never been welcome at our holiday dinners. I get to cook for everyone on the third night when there are plenty of leftovers as backup.

However, last Rosh Hashanah, there was an unexpected change in roles. My mother did not arrive in time to make the soup. She prepared the matzah balls, and my sister took over the soup detail. At some point in the process, she realized she didn't make enough.

And then I got the call: "You need to make the soup for the second night."

"You and Mummy want ME to make the soup?"

"We're desperate."

To say I was nervous is an understatement. How could I possibly live up to my mother's chicken soup? A brisket would have been different. It has always had less prominence than the soup. Besides, it takes a lot to ruin a brisket.

My middle son always points out that my sister's brisket is much better than mine. "Why don't you make Auntie Sherri's recipe?" he asks every holiday.

Well, my sister did give me her recipe. Actually, she got it from her sister-in-law Randi, and I did try to make it once.

Of course, I ended up changing an ingredient or two and taking a couple of short cuts. Needless to say, Son No. 2 was not impressed.

And so when I got those daunting marching orders, I took out my mother's chicken soup recipe and purchased all the ingredients. I realized the success of the holiday meal would be riding on my ability to stick to the recipe. There would be no rolling of the ingredients dice on this one. The stakes were too high.

I knew I would have some tough critics. My mother's chicken soup is a hard act to live up to. And so I stuck to the script. I measured and remeasured every ingredient. There was not a single improvisation.

Much to everyone's surprise (myself included), my soup turned out very well. Who knew you could get such good results just by following a recipe?

I recently made the soup to see if last year's success was a fluke. I got pretty good reviews again and so I'll be doing another trial run. It's like a dress rehearsal. I want to be absolutely ready in case I get a last minute call.

POLA KIRSHNER'S CHICKEN SOUP

1 3-lb. chicken cut in quarters boiling water to cover chicken
4 onions, peeled and lightly salted
2 celery stalks, trimmed
3 parsnips
6 carrots
1/2 bunch dill
7-8 cups water
4 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. pepper
additional salt and pepper to taste

Clean chicken well. Pour boiling water over chicken. Let sit 5 minutes and discard water. Place chicken in a large heavy saucepan. Cover with water. Water level should be about 2 inches above chicken. Bring water to a boil. Skim off scum. Turn down heat and add onions, celery and parsnips.

Bring water to a boil and then simmer for 1 hour. Cover pot loosely with lid to limit evaporation. Add carrots, dill, salt and pepper. Simmer another 1/2 hour. Test chicken to prevent overcooking. Season with salt and pepper if necessary.

To serve, discard celery, onion and dill. Remove chicken and remaining vegetables. Soup can be made a day before serving. When refrigerating, cover chicken and vegetables well. Serve soup with noodles and/or matzah balls. Freezes well, and can be doubled or tripled for large gatherings.

Bake your own Rosh Hashanah challah

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

Challah baking is one of my favourite activities of the Sabbath and Jewish New Year. If people only knew how easy and pleasurable it is to make their own, they'd surely be avoiding the kosher bakery completely.

There's something cathartic about challah baking. First there's the fascination of watching yeast come to life when mixed with water and sugar. In a matter of minutes, a grainy substance begins to foam and explode, promising to massage your egg-flour-sugar mixture until it becomes a warm, doughy substance.

Next there's the joy of the knead. Using a steady wrist, you knead your dough, working through it with floury hands until it's a pliable consistency that feels smooth, responsive and wonderful to the touch. Braid it in any number of ways, get a helpful child to paint it with a beaten egg and then slip it into the oven and wait for the rewarding aroma to fill your home. Once baked, that challah will decorate your dinner table, bring looks of admiration and warm compliments your way and taste like heaven on earth.

Breaking bread with those you love is one of life's greatest pleasures. But when it's bread you've made yourself, that pleasure is multiplied several times over. A KitchenAid mixer is great, and so is a bread machine if you want to save time on the kneading. But when it comes down to it, all you need for a good, homemade challah is a bit of patience, a large bowl, a wooden spoon and a working oven. And like anything, practice makes perfect.

I've used several challah recipes over the years, but keep coming back to a variation on this one, below. It's a recipe that accommodates small changes in flour types, different yeast products and varying temperatures with ease.

Step 1: Using a flask, place one tbsp. of fast-rising yeast, one tbsp. of sugar, 1/2 cup of vegetable oil and two cups of lukewarm water. (Note: ensure water is not too hot. Hot water will kill the yeast.) Cover your flask and set it aside for 10-15 minutes, by which time it will have foamed and bubbled as the sugar and water bring the yeast to life. If this hasn't happened and the mixture looks the same as when you first covered it, your yeast is dead. Throw it out, buy new yeast and start again.

Step 2: In a large bowl, place 5 1/2 cups of flour, 1/2 cup of sugar, a tbsp. of kosher salt, two large eggs and your yeast mixture. For Rosh Hashanah, add raisins and/or sultanas. (A note on the flour: most frequently, challahs are made using only white flour. To add some variety and health benefits, substitute one cup of oat flour, or 2 cups whole wheat flour with 3.5 cups of white flour. The result is a bread that tastes just as good, but is a tad healthier.)

Using a wooden spoon, the dough hook of an electric mixer or a bread machine set on its "dough" program, mix together well for at least 5 minutes until the mixture is combined. Then cover your dough and put it in a warm place such as a sunny windowsill, a still-warm stovetop – or, if it's the dead of winter and warmth is hard to come by, a heating pad or hot water bottle. Let it rise for approximately one hour. Then knead it again.

Step 3: You can repeat the knead-heat-knead cycle a second time, or you can prepare to braid and bake your challah now. For the latter, make sure your oven is preheated to 350, and that you have a clean surface sprinkled with flour to work on and a sharp knife on hand. Use the knife to cut your challah into segments. This quantity of dough makes two large challahs, or approx. 24 challah buns. Once braided, paint your challah with a beaten egg and bake until golden brown (approximately 30 to 40 minutes.) Once baked, challahs freeze beautifully wrapped in tinfoil, and last two-to-three days in the bread bin. They taste best the day they're baked, and make wonderful french toast or cake-like, rich sandwich bread on the weekend.

Reflections on the honey-makers

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

Honey is integral to our Rosh Hashanah celebrations, a potent symbol of a sweet new year and a novel, sticky treat on our dining room tables. But as we head to the grocery store or farmer's market to replenish our supplies of honey, few of us stop to think about where it comes from, how much labour goes into a single pound and the sheer vulnerability of its source: the honeybee.

Consider this: to create a single pound of honey, a bee must tap two million flowers. A hive of 50,000 bees must fly a combined distance of over 55,000 miles to bring that one pound of honey to the table, and that's at an average speed of 24 kilometres an hour. In its lifetime, a worker bee will make only one-tenth of a teaspoon of honey. That's three times the honey we'll gather on a slice of apple before uttering "L'Shanah tovah umetukah."

So, at least three bees will spend their life's labour working for every apple segment we dip into our honey. It's food for thought.

Honeybees came to Canada from Eurasia, and "wild" honeybees were escapees from domesticated hives over the years. The colonies adapted to life in the Great White North, forming hives in forests and wooded shelters and generating heat to warm their hives in the winter. Honey in particular is integral to their survival, giving honeybees sufficient energy to sustain themselves through the long cold season.

In Canada, the majority of honey production and beekeeping occurs in the west, with Alberta tipping the scales for the highest honey production. Most of the honey available in Canada is domestic, and last year we exported $51 million of it to other countries.

The biggest threats to honeybees in Canada are a fungus called nosema and a mite called varoa. Between these and the weather, winter losses to bee colonies were as bad as 60 per cent six years ago. In recent years the losses have been less severe thanks to warmer weather and better controls for dealing with nosema and varoa. But they're still considerable.

Unfortunately, that's just where the problems start for Canadian honeybees. They face parasitic infestations in the wild that have spread to some domestic hives in Eastern Canada, loss of habitat and the as-yet-undetermined effects of pesticides on their lifecycle.

Other countries are battling with a more significant and as yet inexplicable problem: colony collapse disorder. That's when a hive's worker bees abruptly go AWOL. According to the Canada Honey Council, scientists from the United States, France, Spain, Britain and China are racing to solve the mystery of why the honeybee is disappearing. "If we can't stop it," the council warns, "all the colour and vitality in our food supply will disappear for good, because the honeybee is the cornerstone of the environment and critical to our food supply."

So this year, as you prepare to dip your apple and warmly wish your friends and family a happy new year, send a silent prayer out to the honeybee, too. The little critters who dance to alert others as to the direction and distance of nectar and pollen are in a vulnerable state these days. We take them for granted, recognizing them more for their sting than for their pivotal role in agriculture. But their fate will certainly change what and how we eat in the years to come. Will our children be dipping their apples into honey? Or will they be forced to substitute with maple syrup and agave nectar? Only time will tell.

The sweet season: apples and honey for Rosh Hashanah

Sybil Kaplan
Special to The CJN

During Rosh Hashanah, we dip apple pieces in honey, a custom that harks back to biblical times.

According to II Samuel 6:15, King David had a "cake made in a pan and a sweet cake" given to everyone. Hosea 3:1 identifies the "sweet cake" as a raisin cake.

Honey may have been used in the cake, but the honey of ancient Eretz Yisrael was made from dates or grapes or figs or raisins, because the land at the time had no domestic bees, only Syrian bees. To extract honey from their combs, they had to use smoke. Still, honey was of importance in biblical times because there was no sugar.

During the Roman period, Italian bees were introduced to the Middle East and bee honey became more common.

The Torah also describes Israel as "Eretz zvat chalav u'dvash," the land flowing with milk and honey, although the honey was more than likely date honey, which many Sephardi Jews use to this day.

Today, Israel has some 500 beekeepers. They have about 90,000 beehives that produce more than 3,500 tons of honey annually. Kibbutz Yad Mordechai is the largest producer of honey, filling 10,000 containers a day.

It's been written that the average Israeli eats 125 apples and 750 grams of honey a year, mostly around the High Holidays.

For the blessing, Ashkenazim dip challah in honey instead of sprinkling it with salt; then the blessing for the apple dipped in honey, is, "May it be Your will to renew for us a good and sweet year."

Dipping the apple in honey on Rosh Hashanah is said to symbolize the desire for a sweet new year. But why an apple? In Bereshit, the book of Genesis, Israel compares the fragrance of his son Jacob to a field of apple trees.

Scholars tell us that mystical powers were ascribed to the apple and people believed it provided good health and personal well-being.

Some attribute the use of an apple to the translation of the story of Adam and Eve and the forbidden fruit that caused the expulsion from paradise.

The word honey, or "dvash" in Hebrew, has the same numerical value as the words "Av Harachamim," Father of Mercy. Jews hope that God will be merciful on Rosh Hashanah as He judges us for our year's deeds.

Some Moroccans dip apples in honey and serve cooked quince, an apple-like fruit, symbolizing a sweet future. Other Moroccans dip dates in sesame and anise seeds and powdered sugar in addition to dipping apples in honey.

Among some Jews from Egypt, a sweet jelly made of gourds or coconut is used to ensure a sweet year and apples are dipped in sugar water instead of in honey.

Not only is honey used by Jews around the world for dipping apples, it's also found in desserts. Some people maintain that in the biblical expression, "Go your way, eat the fat, drink the sweet," sweet refers to apples and honey.

The recipes below will help make your Rosh Hashanah sweet.

Rosh Hashanah: a vessel of memory

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

When it comes to Rosh Hashanah, I'm a big fan. It's hard not to love a Jewish holiday that's all about spiritual renewal, deep reflection and heartfelt promises to work harder to present our better selves to those around us.

But as I move slowly toward my 40s, I'm realizing there's more than that to the Jewish New Year, more than those deep brown challahs filled with sweet raisins, more than the novelty of dipping apples in golden honey and drizzling them all over the tablecloth before a great meal.

Rosh Hashanah is also a profound vessel of memory, and as I defrost my brisket, hunt for the best-yet new quinoa recipe and knead and shape my challahs, I'll be thinking of the past.

I don't realize, until Rosh Hashanah rolls around, how vividly that past is available, right in a dark corner of my mind. I yank those memories from the recesses and daydream my way back to my days as a 14-year-old growing up in Cape Town, South Africa.

Back then, Rosh Hashanah meant receiving a batch of my grandmother's taiglach, a recipe I'm still determined to tackle and one that will take me, in spirit, immediately and joyfully into her tiny kitchen. It meant hours in synagogue, listening to the deep baritone voices of the Rondebosch Shul choir and the wonderful melodies of the cantor, who we imported from Israel at that time of year.

It meant family discussions on who to invite to our Rosh Hashanah table, and long debates about whether we could tolerate, for another year, the uncle who arrived in his farm-stained overalls and fell asleep on the sofa before the meal was over. Or the aunt who was always asking for recipes (and never using them), and using fingers, rather than salad servers, to select the leafy greens she wanted on her plate.

There were wild cousins whose antics my parents weren't certain they wanted unleashed in the house, and friends whose children my sister and I wanted nothing to do with and campaigned loudly for their removal from the guest list.

In the hours before the festival's arrival, as my mother's culinary activities sent rich aromas wafting through the house, we kids were in charge of setting the table and removing from the dusty cabinet the exquisite glasses my parents had bought while on a Venice honeymoon 15 years earlier. We'd craft name tags and carefully position them around the table, ensuring we occupied the best seats in the house. And we'd decant the wine that an elderly relative had made, pouring it carefully into the crystal decanter that we only used on such occasions.

At the time, I rolled my eyes at the list of chores, grateful for the reprieve from school but unappreciative, as only a teenager with little worldly experience can be, of the treasures at that table – the family members we'd lose as age and cancer robbed them of more time with us, as well as the recipes I'd never have the foresight to record and the hugs and kisses I never cherished long enough.

What I did bring with me over the decades that would follow me into married life with children was an unbridled love for Rosh Hashanah and a determination to make it as memory-laden, meaningful and delicious as possible in my home.

It's why this year and in the years ahead, I'll spend hours on dishes I'd never normally prepare: sodium-filled chicken soup with kneidlach, tender brisket that will tempt even the avowed vegetarians among my kids, wafer thin kichel biscuits –perfect with chopped herring – and sweet, sticky taiglach that will require oodles of syrup and hours of careful babysitting.

I'll do all this and more in the name of memory, because it will conjure up my own past a continent and lifetime away so vividly. And I'll hug my kids extra tight, subdued in the knowledge that one day they too will celebrate this holiday with their own families after I'm six feet under, hopefully cherishing the food and love-laden Rosh Hashanah memories of their own long-gone childhoods.

Netanyahu praised Obama for intervening

"We will continue to keep the peace with Egypt. This is in the common interest of both countries," Netanyahu said. "We will work toward preventing a further deterioration in our relationship with Turkey. We did not choose this sequence of events. To the extent that the matter depends upon us, we shall act to lower tensions and do everything possible to restore relations," he said.

Netanyahu praised the United States for intervening with Egypt in order to rescue the Israelis.

"I would like to express my gratitude to the president of the United States, Barack Obama," the Israeli leader said. "I asked for his help. This was a decisive and fateful moment. He said, 'I will do everything I can.' And so he did. He used every considerable means and influence of the United States to help us. We owe him a special measure of gratitude."

In Ottawa, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) issued a statement calling on Egypt to reaffirm both its responsibilities under international agreement to protect Israeli diplomats in Egypt, and its commitment to maintaining the Israel-Egypt peace treaty.

U.S. President Barack Obama

"We hope that Canada will use its diplomatic contacts with Egypt to reinforce this expectation, including proper Egyptian supervision over the Sinai Peninsula, which borders both Egypt and Israel. The Sinai must not become a staging ground for terrorist actions against Israel," CIJA CEO Shimon Fogel said.

The CIJA statement also noted that Egyptian state-controlled media "regularly broadcasts material that incites hatred of Jews and Israelis."

Fogel urged Canada to "use its influence" to help change this Egyptian policy.

"The broadcast of anti-semitic and inflammatory material encourages violent incidents like the one we saw Friday," Fogel said.

Meanwhile, security around Israel's embassy in Amman, Jordan, has been increased as a result of the Cairo embassy attack.

More security forces and armoured vehicles have been seen on the main roads leading to the embassy, according to Arab reports cited in the Israeli media.

The increased security comes after the establishment over the weekend of a Facebook page calling for Jordanians to attend a "million-man protest" in front of the Israeli Embassy in Amman on Sept. 15, the Israel Project, a Washington-based think-tank, and Yediot Acharonot reported. About 1,000 people have so far indicated that they will attend the event.

Organizers of the protest said demonstrators would try to break into the building, as well as to tear down the Israeli flag.

Jordan signed a peace treaty with Israel in 1994.

Israeli embassies around the world have been put on high alert since last Friday's events in Cairo.

Basel conference affirms Jews' right to Jerusalem

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The Jewish people's historic and religious connection to Jerusalem and Israel are widely acknowledged, but what about their legal rights?

Opponents of Israel repeatedly refer to Israel's "illegal occupation" of territories and to "Palestinian east Jerusalem," but are these terms accurate in law?

A group of academics and legal scholars gathered in Basel, Switzerland, two weeks ago to discuss those issues and to affirm "their support for the recognition of the international legal rights of the State of Israel and the Jewish people in respect to the whole city of Jerusalem." They issued a declaration stating just that, along with their support of "a unified Jerusalem" as the capital of Israel.

> Declaration refers to the international legal documents that form the legal basis for Jews' contemporary claim to Israel

Organized by the Alliance for International Justice in Jerusalem, the conference met on dates corresponding to the first Zionist Congress in 1897 and in the same location, the Musiksaal.

The conference issued a declaration referring to the international legal documents that form the legal basis for Jews' contemporary claim to Israel, which according to conference participant Jacques Gauthier, includes Judea and Samaria (the West Bank).

Gauthier, an international lawyer who addressed the conference, said his legal research over 25 years led him to the conclusion that Jews had a valid legal claim to all the territory west of the Jordan River, including Jerusalem.

"I came to the conclusion that the legal answer came out of key historical events," he said.

The Basel Conference Declaration cites the legal documents that cumulatively gives the Jewish people title to the lands, including Article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations, the San Remo Resolution of the Supreme Council of the Principal Allied Powers of April 25, 1920, and the Mandate for Palestine approved by the Council of the League of Nations on July 24, 1922. "These were the foundational instruments for the establishment of the modern State of Israel," the declaration stated.

It all goes back to the World War I and the defeat of the Ottoman Empire by Britain, France, the United States, Italy and Japan, Gauthier said.

The Ottomans had controlled most of the Middle East, including today's Israel, Syria, Lebanon, Jordan and the Palestinian territories. Historically, victorious powers simply seize the losing power's territories, but under the influence of U.S. president Woodrow Wilson, a much different approach was taken. The five victorious powers, meeting as the Supreme Council, heard claims to the territories from Arab and Jewish representatives.

Chaim Weizmann led the Jewish delegation.

"The Zionists asked for recognition over Palestine of their historical connection and the recognition of the Jewish People as a legal entity, along with the right to reconstitute what they had once had, enough territory to cover all historical links to the Holy Land," Gauthier said.

The Arabs, "who had not been unified and had tribal territories but no states, presented their claims in Paris," Gauthier said. Led by the Hashemite King Faisal, the Arabs asked for a single giant state that would have included Iraq, Syria and Lebanon, but not the area known as Palestine. They had agreed with the Jewish delegation beforehand that that territory would go to the Jews and that each side would support the others' claim.

No decision was made in Paris in 1919, but in San Remo, the Supreme Council reconvened to determine the disposition of the Ottoman territories. "They said 'yes' to the Arabs and gave them Mesopotamia [Iraq] under a British Mandate [trust] and Syria and Lebanon under a French Mandate."

As to Palestine, "they adopted the policy right out of the Balfour Declaration – all the political rights were given to the Jewish People," Gauthier said.

The treaties of Sevres and Lausanne confirmed this and three subsequent treaties created the mandates.

"Those international instruments are binding on all the parties and recognized in international law," Gauthier said.

"The Jewish People are in the city [of Jerusalem] by right. They are not trespassers, they are not there wrongfully," he said.

In 1921, the British severed the east bank of the Jordan and handed it to the Hashemites. "Jews accepted that partition" on the basis that "the rest of Palestine would become a Jewish state."

Asked about Palestinian claims – at the time the Jews were called Palestinians – Gauthier said the Allies dealt with the Jewish people and wouldn't subsequently entertain claims from Jews who said they were excluded, as well as Arab representatives.

"The issue legally involves the Arabs as a whole and they were given rights which were satisfactory, as noted in the documents," he said.

In other words, Gauthier continued, any Palestinian claims were included in the larger Arab claims and were satisfied at that time.

The Jews' claim to Israel is as strong, in law, as those of Syrians, Iraqis and Lebanese to their countries, since all those sovereignties arose from the same documents, Gauthier said.

Israel has annexed Jerusalem, affirming its claim, but has not done the same with the West Bank. That leaves open the possibility of negotiations and ceding by Israel of its rights to some of the land as contemplated in UN Resolution 242, he added.

U.S. schools warned

An Israeli civil rights group has sent letters to 150 U.S. university presidents reminding them of their legal obligations to prevent the harassment of Jewish students on their campuses. In its letter dated Sept. 8, the Shurat Din-Israel Law Center in Tel Aviv also reminded the administrators that their schools have a duty "to reasonably prevent university funds from being diverted to unlawful activities that are directed against the state of Israel." The centre, which according to one report was credited with mostly shutting down the second Freedom Flotilla to the Gaza Strip this summer, cites specific cases of what it calls anti-Israel hostility and Jewish harassment at Rutgers University and the University of California, Berkeley.

IDF base vandalized

An Israeli military base was vandalized in what is believed to be retribution against the army by Jews from the West Bank. Unknown assailants vandalized 13 military vehicles at a West Bank base by puncturing tires, shattering windows and spraying graffiti inveighing against Israel Defence Forces commanders and the dismantling of structures in the settlement of Migron, according to the Israel Defense Forces. The IDF believes soldiers were complicit in the attack, as it is very difficult to infiltrate a military base. The vandalized base is near Ramallah. It marked the first time settlers have allegedly carried out planned vandalism against army property, Ha'aretz reported.

Israel, Greece sign pact

Greece and Israel signed a security co-operation agreement amid declining Israeli relations with neighbouring Turkey. Greek Defence Minister Panos Beglitis, making the first official visit by a Greek defence minister to Israel, and his Israeli counterpart, Ehud Barak, signed a co-operation memorandum on security in Jerusalem last week during his three-day visit to Israel. "I come as my country's defense minister to state our political will as a government, as well as the majority of the country's political forces, for the two countries, the two governments, the two peoples, to work together so that we can further develop and deepen our bilateral relations in all sectors of mutual interest and concern," Beglitis said.

Jewish legislators lobby against Palestinian statehood bid

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The International Council of Jewish Parliamentarians (ICJP) gathered at the United Nations last week to warn that a unilateral declaration of statehood by the Palestinian Authority would violate past agreements, endanger the system of international law and potentially lead to a third intifadah.

Nothing good can come of United Nations support for a unilateral Palestinian declaration of independence, said MP Irwin Cotler, an ICJP spokesperson. Instead, direct bilateral negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians should resume with the goal of creating by mutual consent two states living side by side in peace.

That would be consistent with UN resolutions and agreements between Israel and the Palestinians, which were witnessed by a variety of countries, he said.

Irwin Cotler

Cotler, a Liberal MP and former federal justice minister, joined other ICJP representatives at the UN for a news conference outlining the group's concerns.

Although the United States has indicated that it's prepared to veto any resolution on Palestinian independence at the UN Security Council, he said news reports suggest Palestinian envoys are planning to ask the General Assembly to upgrade its status from observer.

That would not actually create a Palestinian state, but it would give the Palestinian Authority additional weapons to wield against Israel. It would give it the power to take Israel to the International Court of Justice, lay charges at the International Criminal Court (ICC), which it currently has no standing to do, and seek sanctions against Israel.

The upshot of such a development would mean continued attempts to deligitimize Israel while doing nothing to promote peace, Cotler said.

The Palestinian proposal requires a two-thirds majority in the General Assembly to pass, and while the Palestinians can rely on the bloc voting of the Organization of the Islamic Conference as well as several Latin American countries, many votes are still up in the air, including those of Britain and France.

In addition, Russia, Poland and Hungary have yet to announce their positions. Hence the ICJP lobbied the ambassadors of those eastern European countries in a bid to persuade them of the negative consequences of supporting the Palestinian proposal, Cotler said.

Cotler credited Prime Minister Stephen Harper for his July 27 statement in which he called a unilateral declaration of independence "a very unhelpful development" and said a two-state solution should be predicated on "mutual recognition, including recognition of Israel as a Jewish state."

Following the ICJP news conference at the UN, the group left for Washington, D.C., where representatives met with U.S. Congressional leaders and were briefed by Israeli Ambassador Michael Oren.

The ICJP last week released a paper titled Undermining Peace: International Law and Palestinian Statehood. The paper argued that a unilateral declaration of independence "would undermine all accepted international frameworks for peace such as UN Security Council resolutions 242, 338 and 185; the 'road map' for peace, and various [Middle East] Quartet statements, all of which call for a mutually negotiated and agreed-upon resolution of the conflict while rejecting unilateralism."

"It would violate existing Israeli-Palestinian bilateral agreements, most notably the Oslo II agreements."

And the document warned that such "premature and precipitous recognition "might well precipitate new and violent confrontations… when [Palestinian] aspirations will be frustrated rather than realized."

Cotler said that "the integrity of the international process and agreements is at stake here."

Turkish-Israeli relations headed downward

Linda Gradstein
JTA

The bad diplomatic news for Israel just kept getting worse.

First, Turkey announced that it was slashing the level of its diplomatic ties with Israel to the second secretary level, giving the senior Israeli Embassy staff 48 hours to leave the country. Turkey also said it was suspending all military ties with Israel.

Next, the Turkish Embassy in Washington vowed that Turkey would pursue legal action against Israeli soldiers and officials who were involved in the deadly 2010 raid on the Gaza-bound Turkish ship the Mavi Marmara. Then, 40 Israeli travellers on a Tel Aviv-to-Istanbul flight were separated from the other passengers upon landing, and subjected to humiliating searches.

Turkey's actions came as the United Nations released the report of its Palmer committee, which investigated Israel's actions during its May 2010 interception of a flotilla that was trying to break its blockade of Gaza. Israeli troops encountered violent resistance when they tried to board the Mavi Marmara, and the ensuing battle left eight Turkish citizens and one dual Turkish-American citizen dead.

The Palmer report found that Israel's blockade of Gaza was legal and that Israeli commandos needed to use force when they came under attack on the Mavi Marmara. The report also found, however, that Israel used excessive force when boarding the ship.

Turkey has demanded an apology for the deaths of its citizens, but Israel has refused.

"We need not apologize for the fact that naval commandos defended their lives against an assault by violent... activists," Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told his cabinet this week. "We need not apologize for the fact that we acted to stop the smuggling of weapons to Hamas, a terrorist organization that has already fired over 10,000 missiles, rockets and mortar rounds at our civilians. We need not apologize for the fact that we acted to defend our people, our children and our communities."

Recep Tayyip Erdogan

Netanyahu then made a last-ditch attempt to head off Turkey's decision to limit ties with Israel.

"I reiterate that the State of Israel expresses regret over the loss of life. I also hope that a way will be found to overcome the disagreement with Turkey," he said. "Israel has never wanted a deterioration in its relations with Turkey; neither is Israel interested in such a deterioration now."

The crisis in ties with Turkey could have far-reaching implications for Israel. Severing trade between Israel and Turkey – more than $3 billion (US) annually – would have a negative impact on the Israeli economy.

Diplomatically, the crisis could badly affect Israel's relationships with Egypt and Jordan. Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan visited Egypt this week to discuss a deeper strategic relationship with Turkey.

The trip came amid growing opposition in Egypt to the long-standing peace treaty with Israel. Egypt's military leaders could come under increasing pressure to follow Turkey and recall their ambassador from Israel.

"Erdogan will say to the Egyptians, 'What are you doing for the Palestinians?'" Alon Liel, a former Israeli ambassador to Turkey, told JTA. "Egyptians will say, 'Turkey is not even Arab, and they expelled the Israeli ambassador.' It will add to the public pressure."

Liel believes there is even a chance of a military confrontation between Israel and Turkey if, as expected, Israel signs a deal to export liquid natural gas to Cyprus, an island nation that is tensely divided between Greek and Turkish sectors.

"Those vessels will need to go through the Mediterranean, and Turkey will do whatever it can to stop them," Liel said, adding that Turkey has 40,000 soldiers in the Turkish part of Cyprus.

Closer to home for Israelis, the crisis with Turkey could strengthen Hamas, which controls Gaza, and which Israel and the United States see as a terrorist state. Erdogan, an Islamist, has vigorously defended Hamas from those who say it's a terrorist group that should be isolated.

Erdogan has said that he wants to visit Gaza. If Egypt agrees to let him enter Gaza from its territory, it would represent a victory for Hamas and a further challenge to Israel.

Beyond the diplomatic fallout, Israel's relationship with Turkey played an important psychological role. Tens of thousands of Israelis visit Turkey each year with package tours that, even including the one-hour flight, are cheaper than staying at hotels in Eilat. The relationship with Turkey also made Israelis feel connected to the wider Muslim world. Turkey was the first Muslim country to establish diplomatic relations with Israel, in 1949.

"We used to hold up the relationship with Turkey as an example of how Israel can have a relationship with a large Muslim country," a senior Israeli official told JTA. "We're certainly concerned about this now."

In the early days of the state, there were very close ties with Turkey. Israel's first prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, even studied law in Turkey. Those diplomatic ties intensified in the 1980s and 1990s.

The senior Israeli official said there are two schools of thought in Israel surrounding Erdogan. One says that the deterioration in the relationship is specifically because of the flotilla incident and that if Israel apologized, the relationship would return to what it was. The other school, which seems to be gaining ground, is that Erdogan sees himself as a potential leader of the Islamic world and is moving Turkey toward become more religious and more Islam-identified. If that is true, then the flotilla incident is just an excuse to downgrade ties with Israel.

It seems unlikely that the relationship will improve anytime soon. Liel, the former ambassador, says a similar incident happened in 1980 after Israel passed the Jerusalem Law formalizing Israel's unilateral annexation of east Jerusalem, which was captured in 1967.

Turkey then reacted exactly as it did this week – downgrading ties to the level of second secretary. Liel, then a second secretary, was sent to Ankara.

It took 12 years for Turkey to agree to reinstate the Israeli ambassador. After the 1991 Madrid peace conference, Turkey reinstated the Israeli ambassador and accepted the Palestine Liberation Organization's ambassador. Israeli officials say they hope that this time it won't take 12 years to get their ambassador back to Turkey.

Bin Laden saw that the West was in decline

Rabbi Jonathan Sacks

Comment

The 9-11 attacks are linked to a wider moral malaise, including the loss of authority, integrity and family unity

Two things have haunted me since 9-11. The first is the pain, the grief, the lives lost and families devastated, the sheer barbaric ingenuity of evil. The scar in our humanity is still unhealed. The second is our failure to understand what Osama bin Laden was saying about the West. We did not hear the message then. I'm not sure we hear it now.

After the shock and grief subsided, two theories began to be heard. The first was that this was an event of epoch-changing magnitude. The terms of international politics had been transformed. The Cold War was over. Another war had begun. This time the enemy was not the Soviet Union and communism. It was radical, political Islam.

The second was the opposite: 9-11 was terrifying and terrible but it changed nothing because acts of terror never do. Terrorist campaigns have been aimed at other countries. Britain suffered similarly from the Irish Republican Army (IRA) in the 1970s. The most important thing is not to overreact. Terror may bring dividends in local conflicts but it never succeeds in its larger political aims.

There is something to be said for both theories. But there is a third, no less consequential. Why did Al Qaeda attack America? Because it believed that it could. Because it thought the United States was a power past its prime, no longer as lean and hungry as it believed it was.

Former U.S. defence secretary Robert McNamara said that the first rule in politics is to understand your enemy's psychology. As I struggled to understand 9-11, I began to suspect that the answer lay in the events of 1989. That is when the narratives of the West and the rest began seriously to diverge.

In the West, 1989 was seen as the collapse of communism, the fall of the Berlin Wall, the implosion of the Soviet Union and the end of the Cold War. The western narrative was triumphalist. It saw those events as heralding the victory of its values without a shot being fired. The free market and liberal democratic politics had won for the simplest of reasons. They delivered, while communism did not. They would now spread across the world. It was, said foreign policy expert Francis Fukuyama, the beginning of the end of history.

There was, though, another narrative that few were listening to. It said that the Soviet Union collapsed in 1989 not because of the triumph of liberal democracy but because of the Soviet withdrawal from Afghanistan earlier that year. It had invaded in 1979 and was forced to withdraw, not because of superpower politics but because of the determined resistance of a small group of highly motivated religious warriors, the mujahedeen and their helpers. That, historically, is the event that captured the imagination of Osama bin Laden.

According to this account, that one event, the humiliating retreat of the Soviet Army, set in motion a series of internal crises that resulted, months later, in the fall of a great power. If one of the world's two superpowers was vulnerable to asymmetric warfare – the war of the few against the many – why not the other, America itself? What 1989 represented was not the end of history but the end of a history dominated by the twin superpowers of Communist Russia and capitalist America.

Both were vulnerable because both were overripe and about to fall from the tree. Much excitement was felt in the West by the failure of communism. Less attention was paid to what sociologist Daniel Bell called the cultural contradictions of capitalism.

Throughout this period, there were voices that few seemed to be listening to. First and greatest was the philosopher Alasdair MacIntyre in his 1981 masterwork, After Virtue. He argued that the moral discourse of the West had broken down.

The "Enlightenment project" of a purely rational ethic had failed — not because there was no such thing, but because there were too many. They clashed inconclusively and people were left with a sense that morality is whatever you think it is.

His minatory warning was: "The barbarians are not waiting beyond the frontiers; they have already been governing us for quite some time." That was a scary thing to hear from one of the world's great philosophers. I soon began to hear it from other leading intellectuals also, such as Philip Rieff, Christopher Lasch and Robert Bellah. That is what I heard in the echoes of 9-11: that all great civilizations eventually decline, and when they begin to do so they are vulnerable. That is what bin Laden believed about the West and so did some of the West's own greatest minds.

Antisemitic conspiracy theories about 9-11 persist

Dan Klein
JTA

NEW YORK – Osama bin Laden is dead. A new skyscraper is rising at the site of the old World Trade Center. U.S. troops are withdrawing from Iraq and Afghanistan.

Ten years later, the physical legacies of 9-11 attacks are fading into history. Yet the conspiracy theories about who "really" was behind the attacks seem to be growing.

Like a drug-resistant virus, these fantasies have persisted despite efforts to combat them by mutating over time, taking new forms and finding new modes of transmission. Jews and Israel often are their targets, and they evoke centuries-old myths about Jewish power, allegiances and manipulation of social institutions.

The conspiracy theories began almost as soon as the towers fell. Four days after the attack, the Syrian newspaper Al-Thawra reported that 4,000 Jews failed to show up for work at the World Trade Center on 9-11 after being warned by Israeli intelligence, according to a 2007 U.S. State Department document debunking the myth. Another held that five Israeli students were secret Mossad agents who knew about the attacks and allowed them to happen. That myth eventually morphed into the conspiracy theory that the Israelis remotely directed the attacks.

Other myths have followed, spreading around the world and taking root even in the United States. Of 36,000 conspiracy videos recently found on the Internet, 16,000 implicated Jews or Israelis, according to a new report by the Anti-Defamation League titled Decade of Deceit: Anti-Semitic 9/11 Conspiracy Theories 10 Years Later.

"What we've seen in the last 10 years is the proliferation of a real propaganda industry surrounding Sept. 11," said the director of the ADL's civil rights division, Deborah Lauter. "Prominent among those theories are those making antisemitism front and centre."

The theories have amounted to more than just pernicious talk. On June 10, 2009, one alleged 9-11 conspiracy theorist opened fire at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, killing a security guard. The perpetrator, James von Brunn, then 88, died before the case could come to trial.

Experts say 9-11 myths that blame the Jews are spreading freely from neo-Nazis and other white supremacists into new areas whose acolytes are not necessarily antisemitic but are unknowingly adopting the tropes of classical antisemitic conspiracy theories: anti-government radicals, young anti-war activists, New Age ideologues, and propagandists and journalists in the Arab and Muslim worlds.

"What's changed is the proliferation of coded rhetoric to refer to Jews internationally and in the U.S.," said Chip Berlet, a senior analyst at Political Research Associates, a liberal think-tank based in Somerville, Mass. "They're unprepared to recognize it even when they see it."

Michael Barkun, a professor of political science at Syracuse University who has studied extremists and their ideologies, said, "They aren't people who are terribly different from the population at large," except that "they are more likely to be attracted to conspiracy theories."

Alan Sabrosky, a columnist for Veterans Today, an antisemitic website, is one of most widely cited sources for antisemitic 9-11 myths, according to the ADL. Sabrosky has declared his mission to "contain" Israel's ambition by exposing Israel's alleged role in 9-11 and maintains that Washington and New York are the centres of "Zionist power."

Citations of Sabrosky's work pop up not just on extreme-right websites but also on pro-Palestinian websites such as Mondoweiss, Arab media sites and the Internet newsletter Dissent Voice, which describes itself as "a radical newsletter in the search for peace and social justice."

"This is a strange world where the right and the left mix, with antisemitism shot through," said Scott Potok, director of the Southern Poverty Law Center's Intelligence Report. "On the left, it is shot through with anti-Zionism – on the right, the fear of the international Jew."

A 2008 poll of 17 representative nations by the Center for International Security Studies at the University of Maryland found that only nine of the countries surveyed had majorities who believed Al Qaeda orchestrated the attacks. Most of those who believed otherwise did not implicate Israel, however. Instead, they said they did not know who was behind the attacks or blamed the United States. In Russia, Israel-related conspiracy theories were at two per cent of those polled. In Kenya, three per cent believed in Israel-related myths. In Indonesia, the number was five per cent. In the Middle East, however, the numbers were much different. In Egypt, 43 per cent of respondents blamed Israel for 9-11. In Jordan, 31 per cent blamed Israel. In the West Bank and Gaza, the numbers were slightly lower. In Turkey, however, only three per cent believed Israel was behind the attacks.

Conservative columnist Daniel Pipes, who has written two books on conspiracy theories, says such theories about Jews are a fringe element in the West but are par for the course in the Middle East, where he said "they are spread by the mainstream media, leading intellectuals and politicians." Pipes considers 9-11 conspiracy theories a relatively benign false belief akin to theories about the Kennedy assassination – widespread, but not leading to damaging consequences.

The impact of the many 9-11 conspiracy theories is still not entirely clear.

"We're in a period where the boundaries between the mainstream and the fringe have become quite blurred," Barkun said. "Once they were more distinct. Once most people were not exposed to them, or if they were, it was to have them debunked. Now they move quite readily into the mainstream." Barkun added, "This shift in which these ideas have entered the mainstream is so recent that I don't think we are in a position to know what the social effects are."

Berlet said he worries that 9-11 conspiracy theories are fuelling the rise of antisemitic rhetoric in major public forums.

"It is horrifying. It creates a hunt for an enemy and undermines the very concept of democratic society," he said. "You would think that decent people would stand up and say, 'Enough.' It's spreading and our leaders lack the backbone to confront it."

Renew moral disciplines

If so, then 9-11 belongs to a wider series of phenomena affecting the West: the disintegration of the family, the demise of authority, the buildup of personal debt, the collapse of financial institutions, the downgrading of the American economy, the continuing failure of some European economies, the loss of a sense of honour, loyalty and integrity that has brought once esteemed groups into disrepute, the waning throughout the West of a sense of national identity and even last month's riots in Britain.

These are all signs of the arteriosclerosis of a culture, a civilization grown old. Whenever "me" takes precedence over "we," and pleasure today over viability tomorrow, a society is in trouble. If so, then the enemy is not radical Islam, it is us and our by now unsustainable self-indulgence.

The West has expended much energy and courage fighting wars in Afghanistan and Iraq abroad and defeating terror at home. It has spent far less, if any, in renewing its own morality and the institutions – families, communities, ethical codes, standards in public life – where it is created and sustained. But if I am right, this is the West's greatest weakness in the eyes of its enemies as well as its friends.

The only way to save the world is to begin with ourselves. Our burden after 9-11 is to renew the moral disciplines of freedom. Some say it can't be done. They are wrong: it can and must. Surely, we owe the dead no less.

A primer on Palestinian statehood

Uriel Heilman
JTA

When the annual session of the UN General Assembly opens next week, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas is expected to ask UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon to present a Palestinian request for statehood recognition to the UN Security Council.

The long-anticipated request will kick off a chain of events that some analysts are warning could result in a new paroxysm of violence in the Middle East.

Here is a guide to what might happen, and what it might mean.

What do the Palestinians want the United Nations to recognize?

The Palestinians want recognition of the state of Palestine in the entirety of the West Bank, Gaza and eastern Jerusalem. The West Bank – an area controlled by Jordan from the end of Israel's War of Independence in 1949 until it was captured by Israel in the 1967 Six Day War – includes lands on which Jewish settlements now sit. Eastern Jerusalem was effectively annexed by Israel, but the international community views it as occupied territory. In total, more than 600,000 Jews reside in eastern Jerusalem and the West Bank.

PA President Mahmoud Abbas

What's the legal process for becoming a state?

The UN Security Council's approval is required to become a UN member state. The United States, which is one of the 15-member council's five permanent, veto-wielding members, has promised to veto a Palestinian statehood resolution.

Is there a way for the Palestinians to overcome a U.S. veto?

Not in the Security Council. However, the Palestinians still could seek statehood recognition at the UN General Assembly. While a General Assembly vote in favour of Palestinian statehood would not carry the force of law, the passage of such a resolution would be highly symbolic and represent a significant public relations defeat for Israel.

Is there any benefit short of full statehood recognition that the Palestinians can obtain at the United Nations?

Yes. The Palestinians already have non-member permanent observer status at the United Nations, which they obtained in 1974.

This time, the General Assembly could vote to recognize Palestine as a non-member UN state, which would put Palestinian UN membership on par with that of the Vatican. While being a non-member state wouldn't give the Palestinians much more than they have now as a non-state observer, it would be another symbolic victory.

If the Palestinians can get a two-thirds majority in support of statehood in the General Assembly, they also could put forward a so-called Uniting for Peace resolution. This non-binding, advisory resolution could provide legal cover to nations wanting to treat Palestine as a state – for example, allowing sanctions and lawsuits against Israel to go forward. The Uniting for Peace option was first used to circumvent a Soviet veto in the Security Council against action during the Korean War, and it was employed during the 1980s to protect countries that sanctioned apartheid South Africa from being sued under international trade laws.

Why are the Palestinians seeking statehood recognition from the United Nations rather than negotiating directly with Israel?

The Palestinian leadership has eschewed renewed peace talks with Israel, either because Abbas believes that talks with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu won't produce desired results or because Abbas believes he has more to gain by going to the international arena – or both.

Abbas essentially is gambling that the UN move will give him more leverage vis-a-vis Israel, making it more difficult for the Israelis to stick to their current negotiating positions and establishing the pre-1967 lines as the basis for negotiations.

What tools does Israel have to respond to the Palestinian bid?

Israel's strategy now is trying to persuade as many nations as possible – as well as the Palestinians – that a UN vote favouring Palestinian statehood would set back the peace track. The argument is that it would make it less likely that Israeli-Palestinian negotiations would succeed, forcing Israel to dig in its heels.

Beyond that, Israeli experts have warned, Israel may consider the unilateral Palestinian bid for UN recognition an abrogation of the Oslo accords, which stipulated that the framework for resolution of the conflict be negotiations between the two parties. If the Oslo accords, which provides the basis for the limited autonomy the Palestinians currently have in the West Bank, are nullified, Israel may reoccupy portions of the West Bank from which its forces have withdrawn, end security co-operation with the Palestinian Authority and withhold hundreds of millions of dollars in tax money it collects on behalf of the Palestinian Authority.

What are some of the other possible negative consequences for the Palestinians of UN statehood recognition?

The U.S. Congress has threatened to ban assistance to the Palestinian Authority if it pursues recognition of statehood at the United Nations. That could cost the Palestinians as much as $500 million annually, potentially crippling the Palestinian government.

What's the plan for the day after the UN vote?

It's not clear. The Palestinian leadership doesn't seem to have a plan. The Palestinian public is expected to stage mass demonstrations. Israel is preparing for a host of worst-case scenarios, including violence.

If the United Nations does endorse Palestinian statehood in some form, it will be seen as a public relations victory for the Palestinians. But in the absence of progress on the ground in the Middle East, a UN vote could set off popular Palestinian protests against Israel that could escalate into another Palestinian intifadah.

No one knows what another Palestinian intifadah will look like. It's possible that soon after a UN vote, Palestinians will march on Israeli settlements and military positions much like Palestinians in Syria and Lebanon marched on Israel's borders in mid-May to commemorate Nakba Day – the day marking the anniversary of the "catastrophe" of Israel's founding.

Or a UN vote could unleash a new wave of violence, with attacks and counterattacks that destroy the relative calm that has held between Israel and West Bank Palestinians since the second intifada waned in 2004.

The outbreak of violence, however, could undermine Palestinian interests. In the relative absence of Palestinian terrorism in recent years, the Palestinians have managed to get increased economic assistance, established upgraded diplomatic ties with nations throughout the world, rallied more global support for their cause, and seen a considerable rise in their gross domestic product (GDP) and quality of life in the West Bank. They don't want to throw that all away.

That may leave the Palestinians and Israel back where they started before talk of UN recognition began: at a standstill.

UN secretary general supports Palestinian statehood

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The Palestinian people are "long overdue" in their quest for an independent state, UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon said on Friday, ahead of a Palestinian push for statehood in the United Nations planned for later this month.

Ban's comments came a day after Palestinian activists launched a campaign for the recognition of a Palestinian state in the United Nations. The move contradicts earlier reports that the Palestinian Authority was the one who issued the request.

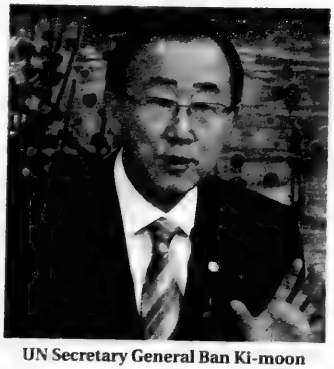
In a letter addressed to Ban's Ramallah office, Palestinian activists urged the leader of the international community to "exert all possible efforts toward the achievement of the Palestinian people's just demands."

Speaking on Friday, the UN chief was quoted by the French news agency AFP as saying he fully supported Palestinian statehood: "The two-state vision where Israel and Palestinians can live... side by side in peace and security – that is a still a valid vision and I fully support it."

"And I support also the statehood of Palestinians, an independent, sovereign state of Palestine. It has been long overdue," Ban told reporters in Canberra, Australia, adding that a "recognition of a state is something to be determined by the member states."

Ban stressed the point further, saying, according to AFP, that it was not a decision to be made "by the Secretary General so I leave it to the member states to decide to recognize or not to recognize."

The UN chief's comments came following following a Ha'aretz report, according to which White House Middle East emissaries Dennis Ross and David Hale met Wednesday with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and made it clear to him that a request to the United Nations for recognition in about two weeks of an independent Palestinian state could have serious implications.



UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon

For his part, Abbas said the Palestinian request for recognition of statehood within the 1967 borders had reached a point of no return and he could not retract it. Ross and Hale also met with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Defence Minister Ehud Barak in the course of their visit to the region, but the trip was aimed at applying last-minute pressure on the Palestinian president.

An Israeli source with knowledge of the details of the meeting between the visiting Americans and Abbas noted that this was the first time the Americans had spelled out the full negative implications of the Palestinian request to the United Nations.

Report studies economic concentration in Israel

Nathan Lipson
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — At the beginning of August, a team of economists at the Finance Ministry finished working on a comprehensive report.

At the time, the public debate on Israel's economic and social future was escalating to new heights, the result of several processes. The first began in October 2010, when Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu announced the establishment of a committee to improve the Israeli economy's competitiveness, which became popularly known as the "economic concentration committee."

Then on July 14, the first tents began popping up on Rothschild Boulevard; the grassroots protest that would make headlines around the world had begun. About two weeks later, the biggest demonstration ever seen in Israel was held.

On Aug. 10, Netanyahu set up another committee, headed by economic adviser Manuel Trajtenberg. The prime minister also noticed that his economic concentration committee had fallen apart – people had left or resigned. He began taking steps to prevent its utter dissolution.

All these processes put economic concentration smack in the middle of the public discourse and created a yawning need for reliable data, numbers the government, the Finance Ministry, the economic concentration committee and the Trajtenberg committee could use to shape recommendations.

Manuel Trajtenberg

Such information was crucial to the public interest. It was needed to prove whether a problem really exists, what its dimensions are and whether it has weakened or worsened over the years.

And exactly at this critical time, the economists at the economics and research department of the Tax Authority, an arm of the Finance Ministry, finished a report based entirely on empirical data. The report's title: Activity by the business groups in Israel: Situation report on the state of economic concentration.

The data on which the report is based is not only comprehensive, it's also the exclusive property of the Finance Ministry, specifically the Tax Authority. It's the database of the annual tax reports filed by all of Israel's companies, private and public. It contains information not only about the companies, but about the wages they pay their employees and managers. There is no better, broader and more up-to-date set of data than this.

The conclusions of the treasury economists are definitive. Foremost, the authors conclude that not only does economic concentration plague Israel, but it grew worse in the period they studied, 2002 to 2008.

They also conclude that economic concentration constitutes a "systemic risk" to the economy: the owners of the pyramidal holding companies manage to channel more and more of the profits made by the group companies to themselves, the "concentration groups" do not create jobs and the wages they pay their workers are lower than at companies outside the great business pyramids.

They found the wage gap between executives and rank-and-file workers stayed the same at companies outside the big conglomerates. The gap widened in them.

A month has passed since the document was finished, but it remained in the hands of a few Finance Ministry people. It did not reach the economic concentration committee. It wasn't sent to the Trajtenberg committee, and it certainly wasn't published in the public domain.

The data in the tables and charts, together with the analysis by the economists of the Economics and Research Department of the Tax Authority, is economic and social dynamite.

The report significantly strengthens the view that economic concentration is afflicting Israel and is causing significant economic damage. It also completely contradicts a report by economist Yaakov Sheinin published in May. Sheinin's report, commissioned by Nochi Dankner's IDB group, the biggest holding company in the land, concluded that economic concentration in Israel is not exceptional.

The treasury report clearly links economic concentration to claims about inequality of income distribution. It states that economic concentration isn't just a main cause of this inequality; it worsens it. The report also underscores the urgent need to find mechanisms that diminish economic concentration for good.

The top people at the Finance Ministry owe an explanation for sitting on the report. If the economic concentration committee and Trajtenberg committee didn't receive access to it before, they may have to stop before releasing their recommendations.

Competition is the cure for what ails Israel

Dror Strum
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The wave of social protests that has washed over Israel is splitting into two main camps.

Analysis

One wants to fix the economy by making it truly competitive, free of giant pyramidal conglomerates that stifle competition, and free of the powerful labour unions that strangle any nascent competition to the monopolistic infrastructure behemoths.

The other camp envisions a sharp transition from a liberal economy based on values of enterprise to a quasi-socialist economy based on central planning and state involvement at all levels.

The quasi-socialists blur their position with the sobriquet "welfare state." But when they spell out their demands in full, it becomes crystal clear they advocate a return to the socialist era in which the government provided housing services, set product prices and inventory levels, and decided who gets to import what (resulting in a regime of cronyism). The list of areas in which they demand state involvement will just grow longer. That's the nature of that conceptual line.

The conflict between the two streams – advocates of liberalism and free competition, and believers in latter-day socialism – will intensify. In any case, Israel is heading for a crossroads that many economies before it have reached. Israel will have to choose between economic freedom and central planning.

This is not indulging in abstracts. Britain faced the same choices in the 19th and 20th centuries, as did the United States in the early 1900s. They chose freedom, subject to one main constraint – a restriction on the formation of elements that would imperil freedom, namely monopolies and cartels.

Russia went a different way, choosing central planning and dictatorship by the proletariat, which all too soon turned into a dictatorship of cronies.

The results speak for themselves. Not only did the Soviet Union collapse as a regime, its economy was one of the worst ever to arise. The incentives to invest in these economies were completely distorted and the results were awful. Everybody got less, and the economic pie shrank.

Israel must choose. It can choose to fix markets born as monopolies, tear down the bad structures, destroy the dictatorship of the trade unions and the creation of a nation of starving temps employed by manpower companies and working under sweatshop conditions more appropriate to 200 years ago. This would open the bottleneck, creating a competitive stream of businesses, investments and jobs, with growing pay and productivity.

Or, Israel can choose to meet the demands of certain protest leaders who want to help themselves to chunks of the budget. It isn't an indecent demand, but it is astonishing in its sheer superficiality. True economic repair doesn't involve merely redistributing the fruits of the tree. It involves curing the tree of its diseases so it produces more fruit.

If the people advising the protesters remain in the thrall of the "social justice" slogan, they will steer the good ship Protest straight into catastrophe.

That's the state of the protest today. The demands "give us more money" and "give us cheap housing in Tel Aviv" must change into a demand for more competition that lowers the average grocery bill and assures us of what we really need in life: jobs, better productivity and wages that reflect output.

At the end of the day, the people of Israel can't live without hope, without opportunity for their children, without a just, open economy. For all that, we need just one thing: competition.

Village was the home of Anne of Green Gables author

Nancy Wigston
Special to The CJN

Forty-five minutes west of Toronto is the blink-and-you'll-miss-it village of Norval: a single set of stoplights, the rippling Credit River, two excellent bakeries, a popular pancake restaurant, two day spas and a country music venue.

Perfect for a day trip, Norval also offers three nature walks, an award-winning heritage garden, trout and salmon fishing, and the calming ambience of Victorian houses surrounded by tall pines. A few new homes crest the hill, yet Norval seems pretty much as it was when Lucy Maud Montgomery lived here.

Lucy who? Kathy Gastle, president of the L.M. Montgomery Museum (located in Crawford's Village Bakeshop), calls the author of the iconic Anne of Green Gables "Maud," as all those who revere Montgomery for the years (1929-1935) she spent here, lovingly recording her fondness for the village, photographing her favourite country walks and organizing amateur theatricals. "My grandmother gave me her posters and photographs from the village theatrical and choral societies that Montgomery founded," says Gastle, who has been hooked on Maud since childhood.

The museum, inaugurated in 2008, houses memorabilia Gastle inherited, with more personal items donated by the descendants of a Montgomery relative who married a Norval boy in the 1930s. "Montgomery played matchmaker," says Gastle. Crawford's Bakery sells fruitcake made according to "Aunt Maud's" recipe, and there's an eponymous cookbook, too.

Recent additions include a display of books published on Montgomery in Japan, evidence of that country's continuing fascination with this red-haired orphan and the Canadian author who created her. Gastle has been known to take inquisitive overseas visitors around the hamlet in her car, showing them the exact spots where Maud loved to walk: unspoiled green valleys and pine forests, the straight path where the "radial railway" ran between Guelph and Toronto. Montgomery would board the train in Norval, venturing into the city to attend meetings of the Arts & Letters Club.

Hollyhocks grow in Heritage Garden

The L.M. Montgomery Museum. [N.Wigston photos]

Museum visitors can purchase Montgomery's books, Anne of Green Gables dolls and the wonderfully kitschy straw hats with red braids attached; a separate room overflows with period antiques. A rare bottle of "Credit Valley Beverage" (soda), made on the Credit, is for sale on the day of our visit; Gastle purchases it for her memorabilia collection. The museum visitors' book bears signatures from Japan, Sweden and England. Further down the road the L.M. Montgomery Heritage Garden is splendid with hollyhocks and climbing roses; steps away, fans can retrace her favourite country path, crossing a bridge over a bubbling creek that joins the Credit River.

A visitor tries on an Anne of Green Gables hat and braids.

Gastle shows me around the Gazebo commemorating the centenary of the Women's Institute (Montgomery was a member), decorated with plaques bearing quotations from Maud's journals that speak of her love for Norval; nearby, a sundial tells the time. A major force in our literary landscape, Montgomery has become more intriguing with time, a phenomenon perhaps explained by the publication, decades after her death, of the five volumes of her disarmingly honest journals. A diarist since her teens, Montgomery published more than 20 novels and 500 short stories, as well as poetry and autobiography. The Selected Journals of L.M. Montgomery, however, tell the story behind the public face.

In her Norval years she suffered depression (emotional and financial), a husband's breakdown, a son's bad behaviour, and the icing on the cake: a fan from hell. (Celebrity stalking was not the familiar term it is today.) These diaries make as gripping a read as anything in her fiction. Norval has become a magnet for Montgomery fans, for scholars heading to the University of Guelph to study her archives, and, says Gastle, a steady flow of "Japanese tourists with layovers at Pearson Airport." Even the recent tsunami has not dimmed Japanese interest in Montgomery; last month, a busload of tourists from Japan arrived in Norval, following a trail that takes them to Prince Edward Island and finally to Halifax, where the writer worked at The Echo, a city newspaper.

"I have never loved any place so well save Cavendish," Montgomery wrote of Norval. Still, the chances are slim that one of Canada's most famous writers who wrote and lived in Norval is known to anglers fishing the Credit on a sunny summer's day. And that Montgomery lived with her minister husband in the Presbyterian Manse on Draper Street is not what draws two genial ladies and their cute-as-pie puppy to shady McNab Park. Ditto for the dozen souls sitting rapt at the feet of herb specialist Richard DeSylva, as he discourses on the multitude of local herbs, much less the deer and her fawn exploring the riverbank. Montgomery, cautious about the notoriety her success attracted, would no doubt have approved.

"Norval is so beautiful it takes my breath away," wrote Maud in her journals.

"The pine hills full of shadows – those river reaches – those bluffs of maple and smooth-trunked beech, drifts of wild white blossom everywhere." Whether you come to fish, picnic by the river, hike historic or ecological paths, gather wild herbs, chase butterflies in the garden or gaze at frogs and turtles in the lily pond, explore the Heritage Garden and museum, enjoy homemade Italian sandwiches and cappuccinos from San Francisco Bakery, sample Crawford's sumptuous array of baked goods and jams, or buy fresh produce at Carter Farm Market (on Winston Churchill Road), this village on the Credit rewards visitors with its timeless, easygoing nature.

Names in the News: Elle Flanders may be a familiar name to those of us who followed the Toronto Pride Parade's ugly "Israel apartheid" controversy over the past two summers. Flanders is one of the prime radicals behind that noxious band of local bigots self-styled as Queers Against Israeli Apartheid, who almost destroyed the parade's long-established sense of friendly inclusion. Now she's back in the public eye with Road Movie, a "film installation" focusing on her primary obsession of many years, the so-called "segregated West Bank."

An official selection of the 2011 Toronto International Film Festival, Road Movie received public funding from the Toronto Arts Council and the National Film Board. Shouldn't these institutions be a tad more selective in the doling out of public dollars? After all, their own fine reputations are at stake. Flanders used an original composition by musician-composer Dave Wall in her film installation. Wall, a co-bandleader of the Flying Bulgars (formerly the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band), has also worked with filmmaker John Greyson, another notorious local anti-Israel agitator. Countless klezmerists of old must be turning in their graves.

Ofra Harnoy kicks off Mooredale Concerts season

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Multi-award-winning cellist Ofra Harnoy will give her first Canadian recital after a decade-long sabbatical to launch the 23rd season of Mooredale Concerts on Sept. 25, at Toronto's Walter Hall.

The Israel-born, Canada-raised, Order of Canada recipient will be joined by Mooredale's artistic director, Anton Kuerti at the piano. The two will include Bach's Suite No. 3 for solo cello, Beethoven's Cello Sonata in A Major, Op. 69 and the romantic Cello Sonata by César Franck in their set.

"It's a pretty meaty program," Harnoy says. "I am excited to work on the Beethoven with Anton because he is such a Beethoven expert. The last work on the program is kind of difficult for Anton because the last time he played the César Franck Sonata was with his wife, (cellist and Mooredale creator, Kristine Bogyo) before she died of cancer (in 2007)."

Harnoy was at the pinnacle of her musical career, having recorded well-over 40 CDs and performing throughout the world, when she decided to take a break. "When I had my kids, I slowed down right at the beginning, and then I realized, I wanted to do very, very little because I really wanted to spend time with them." Harnoy has a 14-year-old son and a 12-year-old daughter.

"I continued to do a few concerts here and there, and then my mother was diagnosed with leukemia," she says. "I basically cancelled everything to take care of her for five years," Harnoy explains. "It was three years ago that she passed away, and it has taken me awhile to get back into things.

"I still want to spend quality time with my kids, they are getting older—so if I do a concert here and there, I am going to be very choosy and picky. I'm doing the Mooredale Concert as a return favour, because I wanted to do a charity event, and I asked Anton Kuerti to help me out with it, and he asked if I would mind to open up the season for his Mooredale Concerts, and I said, only if you play with me. I love that it happened."

Harnoy is excited about the upcoming concert and so are her musically inclined children. Since committing to the concert, she has elevated her practice schedule, while balancing motherhood duties, especially now that her kids are back at school, and needing pickups and drop-offs.

"People have been asking me if I'm going to bring more into the music after this break. What I say is that it is very important to have life experiences to put into your music. Some of the younger generation of musicians' lives are so narrow, performing and performing, that they don't have time to have real life experiences to put into their music, and music is about communicating emotions, feelings and life and it should never be forgotten. The technique is only the means of achieving that," adds Harnoy.

Ofra Harnoy

Prior to the concert Harnoy and Kuerti will participate in a Mooredale Concerts staple called "Music & Truffles", a one-hour, interactive version of their concert, for children 5-15 and their parents. Harnoy says she used to take her children to these events when they were very young.

Harnoy says she is very involved in the Jewish scene and has done lots of charity work for Jewish agencies. "If you have a Jewish soul, it affects how you play. There is a certain something that you carry-on with your Jewishness. It is almost a maturity before your time because you know of all the history of the Jewish people and in my family you knew it from a very young age and it affects everything you do.

"When I play Jewish music it especially brings it close to my heart, like Kol Nidre and modern works by Paul Ben-Haim."

Harnoy and Kuerti kick off the Mooredale Concert series on Sept. 25 at 3:15 p.m. (Music & Truffles at 1:15 p.m.) at Walter Hall in the Edward Johnson Building of the U of T's Faculty of Music, 80 Queen's Park, Toronto. For tickets call: 416-922-3714, ext. 103. Or visit www.mooredaleconcerts.com. Ofra Harnoy's website is www.ofraharnoy.com.

Jewish fraternity inspires band

Laura Fixman

Isaac Simms and Michael Shapinko said they've gotten closer while playing music together in their band, the Responsables.

Simms and Shapinko met while they were members of the Jewish fraternity Alpha Epsilon Pi (AEPi) at the University of Toronto, and they discovered they shared a love of music. They formed the Responsables about a year and a half ago with three other members, and they both said their experience in AEPi informs their lives to this day.

"I learned a lot about my life there," Shapinko said. "I feel like it's informed my life and my Jewish culture to this day."

Simms added, "It was a good way to connect to my Jewish culture, and it gave me the opportunity to take a leadership role."

The Responsables got their name from a sign that said "drink responsibly," which they saw near one of the first venues they played at. They perform reggae music and Shapinko, who mostly plays bass for the band, said that every member of the band has a part in creating their songs.

"We all respect each other musically," he said. "I recognize that everyone's got a different task, and I'm usually the one who handles the weird stuff in our music."

Shapinko has been in various bands since he was 15. He knew he wanted to join a band after he saw the movie Almost Famous. He said the first time he performed it was as much fun as he thought it would be.

The Responsables currently perform at various small venues in downtown Toronto, and Shapinko said he hopes that one day they will be able to make a living from their music. He added that even if they don't, he will continue to perform because he loves music.

"I feel total confidence every time we hit the stage. When we're in the middle of a really good rehearsal or performance we get into this zone," Shapinko said. He added, "I think music is the universal language."

The band is currently working on a CD they hope to release by the end of 2011. In the meantime, their music is available on their Myspace page. They include songs such as Orange Juice, which has a classic reggae sound, and Switch, which mixes in more of the blues rock that Simms and Shapinko originally played together.

Simms, who usually plays guitar in the band, has been interested in music since he was a kid, and he sees it as an opportunity for personal growth, as well as to step out of his comfort zone when it comes to performing.

"I never thought I could sing before, but the more I try it when I perform, the easier it gets," Simms said. "It's definitely a big rush to show people what you can do. I used to get nervous, but it's really a big adrenaline rush when you go up there."

Shapinko said that one of the best parts of being in the band is the friendships that came from working with his bandmates.

"I'd do anything for these guys, and I think they'd do the same for me," he said.

Holocaust novel is set in the Sudetenland

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

Toronto novelist Alison Pick, whose book Far to Go was on the list of 13 contenders for the 2011 Man Booker prize, announced in July, says she has benefited from the honour even though Far to Go did not make the three-title short list that the Man Booker jury released on Sept. 6.

"I think at my stage, I have won already, just by getting on the long list," she told The CJN in August. "I've sold the book in other countries, and my agents have had lots and lots of interest. I feel the book is reaching readers it would not otherwise have reached."

Far to Go (Anansi), which has just been released in paperback, is Pick's second novel. It won the 2010 Canadian Jewish Book Award for fiction. It is a Holocaust story set in the Sudetenland region of Czechoslovakia in 1938 and 1939, around the time of the Munich Agreement and as the Nazis move in and begin to deport Jews to concentration camps.

Far to Go focuses on the travails of one family, the Bauers, as the Nazi noose begins to tighten. Pavel Bauer is a factory owner, husband to Annaliese and father of six-year-old Pepik. The story is told largely from the point of view of the Bauers' nanny, Marta, who is having an affair with Ernst, a trusted family friend who works in Pavel's factory.

Marta keeps mum about Ernst's plan to gain control of Pavel's assets in case the latter is deported. Naïve and uncomprehending of the Nazi's overall plan for the Jews, she seems indifferent to the fate of the Bauers, except as to how it might affect her. But her attachment to Pepik is genuine.

As secular Jews, the Bauers pay more attention to Christmas than to Jewish holidays. But Pavel still feels a strong attachment to his Jewish heritage and won't consider Annaliese's suggestion to have their son baptized for his own protection.

Nevertheless, Annaliese secretly takes the boy to a priest, who asks: "Water or papers?" In other words, should he actually perform the baptism or just provide the necessary paperwork indicating it was done? Annaliese goes for the full deal.

Although described on the book's sleeve as an "epic historical novel," Far to Go seems nothing of the sort. For me, that term evokes colossal works such as War and Peace, Gone With the Wind, and earlier lyrical-heroic counterparts such as the Iliad and the Odyssey, not to mention the Hebrew book of Kings.

By contrast, the action in Far to Go seems almost quotidian and routine. Pick's real achievement lies in recreating the mundane everyday world that the Bauers inhabited as political events transform them from ordinary upper-middle-class citizens into refugees fleeing for their lives. This she does with an admirable degree of verisimilitude.

There is nothing particularly heroic or noble about any of the characters in Far to Go. They are ordinary people, reduced by circumstances imposed on them to hunted creatures who must give up almost everything they possess to disappear into the night. Perhaps their most outstanding accomplishment is that, despite obstacles, they manage to place their son onto a kindertransport to England, saving his life.

Far to Go generates considerable tragic irony by framing the Holocaust-era story within a mystery tale set in recent times. In the modern story, a researcher uncovers Holocaust documents related to the Bauers and friends that bureaucratically indicate their various fates ("Died Auschwitz 1943"). The mysterious researcher, whose identity is revealed as the story unfolds, seeks out a key figure from the Holocaust tale and explains her special relationship to him.

The framing device is a common feature of Holocaust stories (Hannah's Suitcase, Fugitive Pieces, Schindler's List), but Pick lends it a postmodern flourish by allowing her two modern characters to admit that they have jointly written the novel's central Holocaust story to give it the level of realistic detail it required. It is Pick herself, of course, who has actually invented everything in the novel after careful study of many historical sources. The assertion of these two characters that they wrote much of the book seems to undermine its realism and give it some of the fuzziness of myth.

As historical fiction, Far to Go imposes tight limitations on period and character. Most of its scenes are set within the Bauer residence, and we're given few glimpses of the larger society in which the characters lived. This seems a very narrow slice of life in comparison to the expansive canvases of old-fashioned, three-generational sagas such as Isaac Bashevis Singer's The Family Moskat or Thomas Mann's Buddenbrooks. You might say that Far to Go is nicely streamlined in accordance with modern sensibilities.

The novel also seems to touch a chord with modern readers because it satisfies the popular Jewish quest to reach back into time and retrieve, as best we can, our ghosts from the Holocaust. Indeed, Pick says she wrote the book as part of a deep personal quest to learn about her own family's past.

Her grandparents were Czech Jews who escaped to Canada in 1939, settling in Sherbrooke, Que., where her father was born in 1944. Raised in Kitchener-Waterloo, she grew up vaguely knowing of the well-guarded secret of her Jewish roots, but it was something no one in her family would talk about until after her grandmother's death 10 years ago.

"My Dad grew up not knowing that he was Jewish," she said. "He was in the cemetery in Prague when he was a young man in his early 20s, and the tour guide told him that Pick is a Jewish name. He went home and asked his parents and they did tell him they were Jewish, but there was still an atmosphere of secrecy until my grandmother died. She was really the one who didn't want to talk about it. She lost both her parents in Auschwitz and her way of coping with that was just to deny."

In her own life, Pick has turned her family's journey into a circle. Several years ago the author, now in her mid-30s, and her husband converted to Judaism, and are raising their young child as a Jew.

Wheelchair athlete aims for London Paralympics

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Joel Dembe has been playing wheelchair tennis for 13 years now, but it wasn't until last November that he realized he was getting really good at it. As in, best in Canada.

Since his teen years, he's had pretty good success, even though he's treated the sport as something he did "on the side." But when he finished third at the Canadian Nationals, he thought to himself, "How far could I go if I really took the game seriously?"

Last March, Dembe, 27, took a leave of absence from his job in TD Canada Trust's marketing department to devote himself exclusively to tennis. In doing so, he set some goals that are not particularly modest, at the top of which is representing Canada in the 2012 London Paralympics.

Based on his current status, he's got a pretty good chance of fulfilling that dream.

With his most recent showing, Dembe is ranked first in Canada in the ITF Men's Wheelchair tennis singles ranking as of July 2011, and 46th in the world.

He's played in 14 tournaments so far this year and will have competed in 18 by the end of the year, including the Para Pan American Games in Guadalahara, Mexico, later this fall. Tennis has taken him across the continent and in February he won the Puerto Rico Open, his first victory of the season.

In June he won his second tournament win, the Sacramento Capitals Championship. The victory came one week after a quarter-final finish in the Birmingham Canadian Classic in Mississauga.

In May, he finished second in the Texas Open in Dallas, and in August, he won the PoCoMo Wheelchair Tennis Classic in Coquitlam, B.C. Dembe didn't drop a set in that event and convincingly beat fellow Canadian Philippe Bedard in the finals by a score of 6-3, 7-5.

Joel Dembe has his sights set on Top 30 ranking

The win in Sacramento was particularly memorable. "I played a lot of Americans, the top-ranked players," Dembe said.

His success can be attributed to hard work and an ultra-competitive nature. "I'm playing every day or training every day," he said. His regimen includes working on his strength and cardiovascular endurance, and "it's paid off for me," he said.

Working with coach Ben Armstrong, who also trains tennis pro Sharon Fichman, Dembe has managed to improve his first serve. "It's a weapon now," he said, "and my speed on the court is better as well.

"I've gotten stronger in the last few months, so I hit the ball harder throughout the game," he added.

At 46th in the world, Dembe believes he has a shot at the Paralympics, but it's far from a sure thing. "Right now I'm on the cusp. I have to hope that I can maintain my progress. I think I can."

Dembe was born with teratoma, a benign tumor in the abdomen that migrated to his spine, compressing it and causing nerve damage. He began playing as a teen, describing it as "something I've done on the side, never giving it my full commitment."

Over the years he took "baby steps. It's been a slow progression to get to where I am now.

"I've had the opportunity to continue improving year after year. I've never stopped wanting to get better."

"I'm probably one of the more competitive players."

Now that he's at the top of the game, at least as far as Canada is concerned, he remains unsatisfied.

"It's not enough," he said. "I want to be in the Top 30 in the world."

Bengal free safety cites bar mitzvah as milestone

Harvey Rosen
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — And so it has come to pass that the lockout is over and indeed there will be a National Football League (NFL) season in 2011, which means it's time for The CJN's annual survey of Jews in North America's premier pro gridiron circuit.

A good place to start would be free safety Taylor Mays, 23, a second-round pick of the San Francisco 49ers in 2010.

After starting with the Niners last year, Mays was traded to the Cincinnati Bengals on Aug. 24 for an undisclosed draft pick. He had apparently been on the trading block for close to three weeks following the late signing of free agent veteran Donte Whitner.

Mays is an African-American Jew whose dad, Stafford Mays, was a one-time NFL defensive lineman. His Jewish mother, Laurie Mays (nee Black), is a Nordstrom executive.

Born in Seattle, Mays was raised Jewish and had a bar mitzvah. The six-foot-three, 230-pounder, who won All-Pac10 honours twice for the University of California and was a three-time All American in college was, interestingly, quoted in his college yearbook as saying that the aforementioned ceremony was a key event in his life.

He added: "I don't think at the time I really understood what it meant. Now that I am looking back on it, I feel like I have come a long way in regards to maturity and becoming an adult."

Mays, who was chosen in college as one of the top three finalists for the Jim Thorpe Award, given to the nation's best defensive back, played in all of the 49ers 16 games last year, starting in six. He recorded 31 tackles and assisted on seven others.

Taylor Mays was traded by the San Francisco 49ers to the Bengals

Then there's Antonio Garay, 32, a Boston College grad whose mom is Jewish and whose dad is Catholic. Drafted by Cleveland in the sixth round in 2003, Garay is a former national wrestling champion. A defensive tackle who went on to play for the Bears and later was plucked off the New York Jets practice roster by the Chargers, Garay comes in the large economy size at six-foot-four and 320 pounds.

In San Diego, Garay won the job as starting nose tackle for most of the 2010 season and finished with an impressive 48 tackles and five sacks, leading all defensive linemen on the roster. That performance earned him a new two-year contract with the Chargers.

Anything in the world of sports can happen, but it appears that Sage Rosenfels, at age 33, will remain a backup quarterback in his final gridiron years. The son of a Jewish father was taken in the 2001 draft by Washington and has also had stops in Miami, Houston and Minnesota after playing college ball at Iowa State.

His best shot was perhaps with the Vikings until a guy named Brent Favre showed up. Now Rosenfels is on stage with the Giants in New York where, naturally, Eli Manning will start. The only action the six-foot-four and 225-pound signal-caller saw last year was in a single game in the fourth quarter of a victory at Seattle. Not counting that brief fling, he was also the team's holder for field goals and extra points.

Two years ago, a pair of Jewish behemoths met at practice on a gridiron in Dallas and developed mutual respect for one another – Cowboys Igor Olshanski, a 29-year-old defensive right end who stands six-foot-five and tips the scales at 315 pounds, and Kyle Kosier, 32, an offensive guard at the same height and six pounds lighter. Interestingly, neither knew of each other's ethnic background.

Olshanski holds the distinction of being the first Russian to make it in the NFL. Taken in the second round (35th overall) in 2004 by the Chargers, he played football at the University of Oregon. After five seasons with San Diego, he signed a four-year contract as an unrestricted free agent in 2009 with Dallas.

He and his wife, Liya Rubinshteyn, still live on the West Coast. In his youth, he attended the Hebrew Academy of San Francisco, and among his many tattoos are a pair of Magen Davids.

Last season Olshanski recorded 38 tackles and 21 assisted take downs while appearing in all 16 games.

Kosier, a left guard, hails from Peoria, Ariz. The big man, who is Jewish on his mom's side, has been with Dallas since 2006 and was re-signed in 2011. Kosier was taken in the 2002 draft by San Francisco. He played three years with the 49ers before moving to the Lions for a single season. He lettered at Arizona State University in football, basketball, baseball and track and field.

According to Jonathan Bales of the DC Times, Kosier offers pass protection deluxe and didn't allow a single sack all season in 495 plays. Small wonder Kosier was inked for another three years.

David Binn, 39, long snapper with the Chargers for the past 17 years, has been on injured reserve since September 2010. He's the last remaining San Diego player from their Super Bowl cast and leads the team in career games played. The son of a Jewish father, at six-foot-three and 228 pounds, he severely injured his hamstring during a punt return. He is considered by many to be the best at his position in the NFL. His return date is unknown.

Quarterback Sage Rosenfels when he was with the Vikings

After four years with Jacksonville, punter Adam Podlash, 28, signed this summer with the Bears. The former Maryland Terrapin had a superb season with the Jaguars in 2010, when he recorded a career-best 43.8 yards per punt and 26 punts inside the 20.

In the off-season, the 2007 fourth-round selection had a scare when he was diagnosed with salivary gland cancer. Following surgery, he learned that neither chemo nor radiation would be necessary.

Julian Edelman, 25, is a wide receiver and punt returner with New England, yet in college, at Kent State, the seventh-round pick of the Patriots in 2009 was a three-year starter at quarterback. He saw limited play in 2010, managing only seven receptions for 86 yards in 15 games after an impressive rookie season in which he snared 37 for 359 yards in only 11 starts. Playing quarterback in the NFL was probably unrealistic at just five-foot-10 and 198 pounds.

Perhaps he'll return to his earlier position, as this summer he has been working out in California with Patriot QB Tom Brady.

Lastly, watch for offensive guard and tackle Geoff Schwartz, 25, who stands six-foot-six and weighs in at 331 pounds. He's in his fourth year with the Panthers and played his college ball with the Oregon Ducks where he was a three-year starter at tackle. He started all 16 games last season with Carolina, which drafted him in round seven in 2008. An all-round athlete who excelled in baseball and basketball, Schwartz is described as "nasty and finishes his blocks."

Schwartz started the season on the injured reserve list after hurting his hip.

Israeli website helps travellers connect worldwide

Cara Stern
Special to The CJN

The best way to see a city is by meeting the locals. That's the idea behind Jewgether, a website that connects Jewish travellers with Jewish locals around the world.

"Local people know the best places so it's nice to go with them and really get to know the place," said Boaz Albaranes, one of three Israeli co-founders of Jewgether.

The Israeli-based site allows travellers to create profiles and search through a database of people who could host them while on a trip abroad.

Hosting could be anything from inviting the traveller for a Shabbat dinner, showing them around the city, or giving them a space to sleep.

It all began after two of the founders travelled to the United States to attend two different Jewish summer camps. After spending weeks at the camp, they travelled around the country visiting their new friends.

If the two of them enjoyed this type of travelling so much, why not spread it around the world, said Albaranes, who runs the site along with fellow co-founders Doron Samish and Tamir Einy.

The project began as part of a year-long Stand With Us fellowship in 2007-2008. In it they learned about Israel advocacy, the media and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

It was a program for leaders in the Jewish world, said Einy. "They would like to empower people to be the next leaders of Israel."

The final assignment had students, in groups of 20, create a project that somehow relates to the Jewish world, Albaranes explained.

When the fellowship ended, the three students decided to continue with the project, opening it to the public in the summer of 2009.

To ensure the safety of its users, profiles require everybody to post a photograph that makes their face clear.

When a new person registers, they undergo an approval process, in which the co-founders work to determine if the applicant appears safe. Einy described the process as quite a long one, taking up to 24 hours per applicant.

"We [also] suggest people to meet in a public place, or they can ask for a password from the guest," Einy said.

Additionally, users can write reviews of either their guests or hosts, vouching for the user or explaining to others what to expect from a visit with that person.

"People write their profiles including where they live, their kosher level, if they keep Shabbat or not, and they tell about themselves," Einy said. "They also mention their family members and there are many pictures."

While the co-founders receive notification when a host accepts a meet-up request, many make the initial connection on the site and then move to e-mail or telephone to come up with the details of their plan, explained Albaranes, so they can only speculate about the number of meetings that the site has led to. However, he estimates the number to be several hundred.

Someone interested in making a connection can register with the website. After approval, they can specify which continent or country they would like to visit and then get a directory of users in those places, with the option of contacting them to arrange a connection.

So far, about about 1,500 users from around 40 different countries have been approved. Much of the advertising has come through Facebook and other websites, as well as through word of mouth.

Mike Klein is one user who has hosted a family he connected with through the website. He described the guests as a young couple who had probably been couch-surfing throughout most of their travels around the United States.

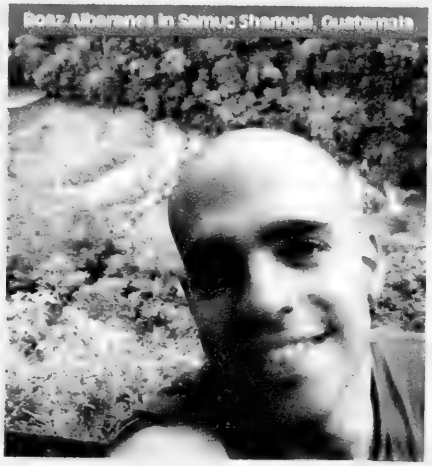
He said he would typically give them freedom to do whatever they wanted, but might meet for dinners and spend some time together in the evenings.

He had also hosted Einy and several other Israelis through the mishlachat program at the Reform movement's Camp Newman in California, in which Israelis, generally after serving in the army, attend as staff to teach campers about Israel.

"It brings a little bit of Israel to our local communities," said Klein, who is based in Monterey County, Calif.

The Jewgether website also features blog posts and columns by Albaranes and Teddy Weinberger, a columnist on Jewish life who also helps with fundraising and English-language materials for Jewgether.

Doron Samish traveling in Israel



Boaz Albaranes in Samuc Shampel, Guatemala

The organization recently gained non-profit status, allowing them to accept donations to maintain and further develop the website. Additionally, they recently received a grant from the ROI Community, an organization that supports Jewish innovation.

All of the founders have made connections through the website. Albaranes said he met a family when he visited Guatemala who spent some time teaching him about the city and the country, and what it's like to be a Jew in Guatemala.

He learned that it's very different from living as a Jew in Israel, where being Jewish is the norm.

It takes a lot more to be Jewish as part of such a small minority, he said.

"If you speak logistically, they have to bring their kosher food from Mexico City every week," he said. "It was a different Judaism."

He said that's part of what makes Jewgether so special. Not only do you get to connect through religion and culture, but also get to know the country you're visiting.

"We have many members who are religious, but it's not necessarily for religious things," said Einy, who pointed out that only about 27 per cent of the site's users observe Shabbat. "It's for people to meet on Friday, but also on Tuesday and on Sunday. It's not just for Shabbat, but every day."

'I hate penny pinchers'

"It's time you met new people," Meir says, as he looks sadly at our ex-friends leaving our house, smiling, unaware of their new status.

"After I bought her china, a perfume and earrings," I shout, "all she brings me are some lousy buns! Homemade buns! I wanted to punch her in the nose."

Meir cut me off.

"Maybe," he says, "maybe I'll register you in a nice therapeutic group so you'll meet nice people? Say, an anger management group?"

"How about positive thinking instead," I say, ending the conversation.

The lecturer gets on my nerves right from the start. Rosh Hashanah dinner is ahead, I'm hosting, and she expects me to be all jolly and cheerful because it's sunny today. (I hate the sun!)

After telling everyone our names, we're asked to say two things we love and two things we hate.

"Anyone care to start?" asks the lecturer, a synthetic smile plastered on her face. Luckily, Jeffrey, and another 10 other people, are more than willing to start (a bunch of narcissists, every one of them).

Jeffrey: "I love my wife [who's Mamma's flunky boy?], yeah... and I love my great job [who wants to make Nina furiously jealous?], and I hate... gosh, what do I hate? Hard to say [then why did you raise your hand and didn't let other people, say, me, talk?]. OK, I hate it when people judge me [I'm afraid the lecturer's neck is about to break from nodding], and especially I hate it when my wife criticizes me. Ha-ha." [Laughter? Why are you all laughing?]

Lecturer: "Thank you so much, Jeffrey. Who's next?" (Excuse me? The man's just admitted he hated his wife? There's a problem here. Anyone?)

Natalie (Bursting into someone's turn. I believe it was mine): "I love open fields, blooming flowers, the sunset [give me a break, Pollyanna!], I love my good friends, I love my art [Hey! She said two things. Two. Give someone else a shot!], and I hate petty people [why are you looking at me, Polly?] and... and that's it." (Praise the Lord).

David: "I guess I'll be next? If it's OK by you? [He smiles to the lecturer. Who's the teacher's pet?] I love the way I look [way to go, Dave. I love your pot belly, too] What? Wasn't I suppose to say that? [The lecturer's going to need a neck brace soon.] I love funny, light-headed people [we might get along], and I hate my inner self." (Wow, some respect here people, please.)

Lecturer: "Well, David, we'll discuss it as soon as we finish the round." (What round? The man admitted he hated his own guts! That's it. I'm outta here!)

Lecturer (sweetly, to me): "Would you like to go next?" (I sure would like to go. Next!)

Me: "I hate skinny models. I hate self-centred people. I hate penny-pinchers [Buns! Homemade buns!]. I hate loaded, successful artists. I hate summer. I hate nature. I hate..."

Lecturer (calmly cutting me off): "And what do you love, Nina?"

What do I love?

The unprecedented erection of "tent city" encampments in Israel as a gesture of social protest and solidarity among an increasingly alienated middle class also mirrors the "broadening mandate" of the country's Rabbis for Human Rights organization, Rabbi Arik Ascherman, its director of special projects, said.

The summer of 2011

In the summer of 2011, I painted another picture, one that reflects three trees whose branches are intertwined. Why three? It's the number I'm most comfortable with. One makes me feel insignificant. Two makes me feel edgy – too much intimacy.

In the summer of 2011, a famine in the Horn of Africa came to light. Images of emaciated children challenged us once again. The economy continued its byzantine journey and America confirmed its status as a debtor nation.

Amy Winehouse died. An earthquake reverberated throughout Ontario.

This summer my nephew, Shragi, got married. His wedding was a simchah plus.

I went to Christian Island, Eli's cottage, with my boy, Noah River. He kept asking me, as we passed through cities such as Barrie, Elmvale and Lafontaine, if we were still in Canada. Noah steered the ferry. We canoed.

In the summer of 2011, Roberto Rotherham continued to surf the waters off El Salvador, as he has been doing since the 1970s. Ladies walked Pomeranians on the east side of Manhattan, and scooters and BMW convertibles were the rage.

This summer, Moses was told he would not be allowed into Israel. Scholars grappled with that justice. My mother was distraught one more time, because she had grown once again to love Moses and his siblings, Aaron and Miriam.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

This summer, Gilad Schalit was still in jail and so was Jonathan Pollard. Nicole's dad died and was buried in Jerusalem. Terrorists began bombing southern Israel once again, and more Israelis are dead.

This summer, I felt as if I lived in paradise. My niece told me paradise can be boring. I told her that might be why Adam and Eve ate the fig.

In July 2011, I met a man who needed $20 for food. Weeks later, I met someone who worried how he would keep his wealth. In July and August, Ve'ahavta held its second Street Academy for the homeless and near homeless. Amanda, a student, cried after receiving gifts from the academy. She couldn't remember the last time she had been given something.

In the summer of 2011, my friend, Bernie Farber, stepped up his campaign to become a politician. Toronto's mayor missed Gay Pride. NDP leader Jack Layton passed away and Prime Minister Stephen Harper said he would "miss that jam."

This summer, I sold my condo and a man dented my car. I bought a stuffed cat for Noah named Cordio, and I watched Eric Clapton's Crossroads over and over. This summer, I played more blues on my guitar. I bought a new CPAP mask, and my friend Jon, solidified his place as one of the finest Jewish reggae singer-songwriters on the planet.

In the summer of 2011, I'm sure a boy and girl fell in love in some distant province in India, and no doubt a mayor in a forsaken town in Guatemala brought electricity to his constituents.

The weather was hot and rainy, and never before have I seen Toronto so lush. For the first time, I actually fell in love with our city. Maybe next summer I'll see its spirit and fall in love with that.

In the summer of 2011, our First Nations people still suffered terribly and school leaders failed once again to include our country's real past in its history books.

But the sun shone. We cottaged, and joy abounded.

Such was the summer of 2011. It was thus in 1802, and will be thus in 2156.

Life is a mystery. Life is consistent.

Abbas rejects last minute compromises

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Palestinian Authority has rejected several attempts to sway it from its statehood bid at the United Nations and have it move toward resumed peace talks with Israel, Ha'aretz learned on Sunday.

Sources said Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas rebuffed recent proposals that included compromises by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Representatives of the Quartet on the Middle East – the United States, Russia, the European Union, and the United Nations – met in New York Sunday to draft a statement calling for direct peace talks to resume.

Netanyahu reportedly agreed to several compromises in the Quartet proposals, specifically on issues such as the recognition of Israel as a Jewish state, among others.

Regarding the proposed borders of a future Palestinian state, Netanyahu reportedly agreed to vague wording concerning the West Bank's main settlement blocs. Netanyahu consented to a more ambiguous wording in order to give the Americans and special envoy Tony Blair some leeway with the Palestinians.

'Canada is our best friend in the world'

Mordechai Ben-Dat
Editor

"I am here to express our appreciation to Canada, its government and its people," Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman told The CJN on the weekend. "Canada is our best, most reliable friend in the world. And it is necessary to prove friendship by expressing appreciation to your friends."

During a brief stopover in Toronto at the beginning of a busy itinerary, Lieberman met for 10 minutes with The CJN for an exclusive interview before a private meeting with lay and professional leaders in the community.

From Toronto, Lieberman flew to Ottawa for bilateral talks with his Canadian counterpart. Lieberman had met John Baird when the Canadian foreign minister served in a previous capacity. Lieberman was looking forward to renewing the relationship, he said.

He was also scheduled to meet with interim Opposition leader Nycole Turmel, interim Liberal party leader Bob Rae and Jewish community leaders there. After Ottawa, Lieberman was scheduled to head west to Vancouver to fulfil a promise he made to meet with members of the community there.

"Every visit, we try to strengthen and deepen our relationship. We must make even more efforts to strengthen relations in the political realm and in the realm of people to people," he said.

Convictions Upheld

TORONTO — Theatre impesarios Garth Drabinsky and Myron Gottlieb were ordered to jail last week after the Ontario Court of Appeals upheld their 2009 convictions for fraud. The judge reduced Drabinsky's sentence to five years from seven and Gottlieb's to four from six for misstating the financial position of Livent, which they steered in the 1990s to become North America's largest theatre company. Their lawyers are considering whether to seek leave to appeal to the Supreme Court, their last chance to avoid prison.

Jew App Removed

PARIS — A made-in-France iPhone app called "Jew or Not Jew?" was removed from the French app store, its creator, Johann Levy, told JTA. The application had been under fire for stigmatizing Jews. French Jewish and human rights groups said the application, which came out last month and allows users to guess whether public personalities are Jewish or not, violates French law forbidding the collection of personal data such as a person's religion or ethnicity without permission from the individual. The law was largely founded on the principle that Nazi occupiers used similar methods to round up Jews in World War II and send them to death camps. Levy said he intended to show "pride" in being Jewish.

Divestment Urged

NEW YORK — A committee of the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.) has reopened controversy by urging the church to divest from three firms doing business with Israel. The Committee on Mission Responsibility Through Investment released a report Sept. 9 urging the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church to divest from Motorola, Hewlett-Packard and Caterpillar. It provoked criticism from Presbyterian and Jewish groups, and the American Jewish Committee and the Anti-Defamation League condemned the report. Rabbi Noam Marans, AJC's director of intergroup and interreligious relation said that "threatening divestment undermines those who are truly committed to Israeli-Palestinian peace." In 2006, the church replaced a 2004 policy that called for "phased selective divestment" from firms operating in Israel with one that called for investment in Israel, Gaza, east Jerusalem and the West Bank "in only peaceful pursuits." In 2008, the church's General Assembly instructed Presbyterians to avoid over-identifying with one side on the Israel-Palestine conflict. The report will be voted on at the church's General Assembly next year.

Labour Dispute Postpones Concerts

TORONTO — Two concerts by singer Mandy Patinkin that sparked controversy in the Jewish community because of his support for a boycott of a Jewish theatre in the West Bank were postponed due to a labour dispute at the venue where he was scheduled to perform.

Toronto's Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company announced that Patinkin's Sept. 17 and 18 performances of his critically acclaimed Broadway theatre concert Mamaloshen have been postponed until June.

"Due to complications associated with the labour dispute at St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts that are beyond our control, we are rescheduling the Mandy Patinkin Mamaloshen concert to June 16 and 17, 2012," the company said, adding that "we look forward to closing our fifth anniversary season of stars with this wonderful concert."

The labour dispute is unrelated to the controversy surrounding the concerts. Some in the Toronto Jewish community wanted them cancelled because of Patinkin's outspoken support for a boycott by Israeli performers of a new theatre in the Israeli community of Ariel in the West Bank. The Jewish Defence League had planned to protest outside the Sept. 18 show.

Patinkin is a longtime supporter of Israel.

Professor's comment raises tensions at York

CIJA calls incident 'an unfortunate misunderstanding'

heri Shefa
taff Reporter

An apparent misunderstanding of a tatement made by a York University pro- essor has given way to a debate about hether members of the Jewish commu- ity have become hypersensitive around he issue of antisemitism on campus.

It took mere hours for fourth-year York tudent Sarah Grunfeld to circulate on logs, Facebook and the mainstream me- ia what she felt was an antisemitic state- ent made last week by York professor Cameron Johnston.

Grunfeld claimed that Johnston told nearly 500 students in his first-year "Self, Culture and Society" social sciences class that his course would be evaluated solely on opinion and that in his opinion, "all Jews need to be sterilized."

Zach Liknaitzky, president of Hillel at York, said that within hours of the incident, a distraught Grunfeld came to the Hillel office with her complaint.

"Our first approach was to calm her down and make sure she didn't do anything rash," Liknaitzky said.

"We thought to ourselves, 'There is probably more to this story than we know at the moment.'"

He said he encouraged Grunfeld to go through the proper channels – to contact York's administration and the head of his department.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, said his organization also reached out to Grunfeld once it learned about the incident.

"Part of what motivated us was that when first hearing about the story, it tested our credulity, and when something seems too bizarre to be true... it really does demand some serious inquiries," Fogel said.

After contacting York and Johnston, CIJA released a statement that called the incident "an unfortunate misunderstanding" that "without ill intentions, [was] taken out of context."

After initially agreeing to talk to The CJN, by late last week, the professor said he was declining further interviews on the matter.

But attached to the CIJA statement was a clarification written by Johnston, who has been teaching at York for more than 30 years.

Zach Liknaitzky

He explained that during his introductory lecture, he told his students that the course would focus on texts, not opinion.

"In fact, I stated that for this course opinions are not relevant, and I questioned the common idea that everyone is entitled to their opinion."

Johnston added that an example of how someone would not be entitled to an opinion would be if they made an antisemitic statement.

"For the record, I am also Jewish, which undoubtedly influenced my choice of this example of a reprehensible opinion."

Dishonest modus operandi

Relations between the Palestinian Authority and the government of Israel hover before a precipice. So, too, does the possibility of a peaceful resolution in the relatively near future of the conflict between the two peoples.

By this time next week, when Jews all around the world welcome the New Year 5772, we should know whether those relations fell beyond reach, far into a dark chasm, or whether, they were rescued from the brink, to a point of greater bilateral safety, if not quite mutual respect and trust.

As of this writing, as the weekend came to an end, merely five days away from the much anticipated fulfilment by PA leader Mahmoud Abbas of his promise (threat) to seek recognition of an independent Palestinian state from the United Nations, the Jewish world was filled with anxiety.

From the editor's desk...

The diplomats of the West are also worried over an outcome whose dimensions are unclear, the fallout from which could cause far-reaching, long-lasting harm to the theatrical charade euphemistically called the peace process.

As of last Friday, however, certain aspects of Abbas' impending unilateral action were made clearer.

In a speech to the Palestinian people last Friday from Ramallah, Abbas announced that he would directly engage the UN Security Council, rather than the General Assembly, for the nod of full sovereign recognition.

The significance of the announcement cannot be overstated. Originally, it was assumed that Abbas would place the independence resolution on the agenda of the General Assembly because he was assured of a majority in support of his request.

By bringing the matter to the General Assembly, Abbas would gain a major symbolic victory without actually breaking the back of possible diplomatic advancement since it has no mechanism to enforce the resolution.

Only the Security Council has the authority to enforce an independence-recognizing resolution.

But the United States had already publicly committed to vetoing such a resolution at the Security Council.

Thus by announcing his intention to bring the vote directly to the Security Council, Abbas, in effect, is publicly challenging the United States, uncaring about the ensuing embarrassment to the State Department and the overt public display of contempt for U.S. President Barack Obama.

He has chosen to "confront" Washington in so brazen a manner even though the Americans have pleaded with him not to do so, even though they annually give the PA hundreds of millions of dollars in aid, even though Obama has publicly remonstrated against Israeli housing policy in the West Bank and in Jerusalem, and even though he knows that setting up such an artificial conflict with the Americans could well lead to violence against American interests throughout the Middle East.

Could there be a louder, more resoundingly derisive slap to the face of the American president?

In his Ramallah speech, Abbas offered his trademark prevarications and over-weaning entreaties of victimhood. "What I will take to the UN will be the suffering and concerns of our people that have been taking place over 63 years living under the occupation," Abbas said. (My emphasis)

It may have been a Freudian slip or a calculated restatement for internal Palestinian purposes of his credential to lead. But his reference t 63 years of "the" occupation – name ly, Israeli occupation – brings hin squarely alongside the rejectionist of Hamas.

After Israel's War of Indepen dence, that is to say, 63 years ag neither Gaza nor the West Bank wer under Israeli control. Israel did no "occupy" those territories until afte the Six Day War.

Abbas also hailed the Cairo agree ment earlier in the year that brough about a theoretical, but not yet func tional, unity between the Palestin Liberation Organization and Hamas "There is nothing better than nation al unity between the West Bank an Gaza, and we will do everything w can to maintain this unity," he said.

Proving the utter unreliability o anything that Abbas tells the weste world was the subsequent statemen by Hamas leader Ismail Haniyeh amplifying his group's views of th Abbas initiative. "We repeat toda that we are with the establishmen of a Palestinian state on any liber ated part of Palestinian land tha is agreed upon by the Palestinia people, without recognizing Israe or conceding any inch of historica Palestine."

Haniyeh emphasized there coul be "no mandate for any Palestinia leadership to infringe on Palestin ian national rights, nor is there a mandate for any Palestinian acto to make historic concessions on Pal estinian land or regarding the right of the Palestinians, foremost among them the right of return. Given this position, we reiterate our rejectio of this [Abbas UN effort] bid."

Of course, Abbas hopes that no western countries will pay attentio to Haniyeh's clarification. That has been his unwise, dishonest modus operandi from the very start.

UNRWA aid should be conditional: researchers

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

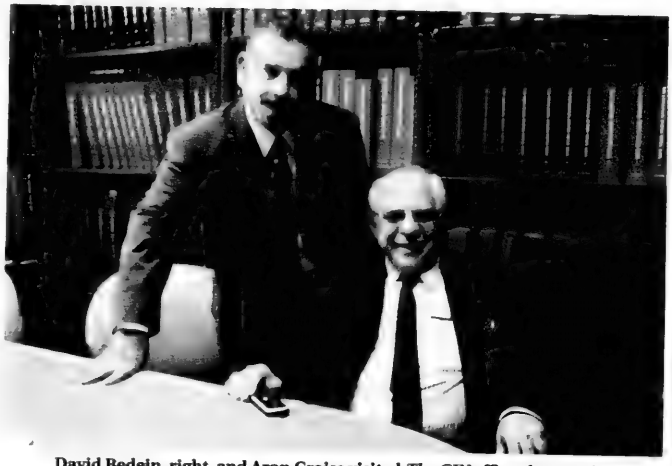
An Israeli watchdog group is urging western governments to make their aid to the UN Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA) conditional on changes to Palestinian texts taught in UNRWA schools.

The schoolbooks are rife with "calls for war," and they ignore the existence of the State of Israel and the historic Jewish ties to the Holy Land, said David Bedein, head of the Center for Near East Policy Research, and Arnon Groiss, director of research for the Institute for Monitoring Peace and Cultural Tolerance in School Education.

Twenty-five per cent of Palestinian children are educated in UNRWA schools, said Groiss, adding, "You are responsible for what you teach."

"Hundreds of thousands of children are in [UNRWA] schools, and by a policy of non-involvement in the books, you are responsible for perpetuation of the conflict," asserted Groiss, who has read 150 schoolbooks published by the Palestinian Authority for all grades.

Bedein and Groiss were in Canada last week to publicize their findings and to brief officials in Ottawa. Later, they addressed reporters at the United Nations and met congressmen as well as State Department officials and White House staff in Washington.



David Bedein, right, and Aron Groiss visited The CJN offices last week.
[Paul Lungen photo]

In Canada, they presented the government with a report on UNRWA, which is mandated to provide humanitarian aid to Palestinians. Unlike a second UN refugee agency, UNHCR, which is responsible for all the world's other refugees, UNRWA rejects the most common solution for refugee populations – permanent settlement elsewhere, sai Bedein.

The report, titled Update: UNRWA fo Palestinian Refugees, states, "UNRW for more than six decades has made th notion of 'return' the focal point of it operation.

"The refugees themselves pay a pric for this policy, for they are maintained i a stateless limbo situation, unable to fin permanency and get on with their lives. The reality is they are political pawns forced to live with uncertainty when thei problem might have been resolved, s they might be used to pressure Israel."

Bedein has long criticized UNRW for perpetuating the conflict an promoting the Palestinian politica agenda encapsulated in the phrase "right of return" – the demand tha refugees who fled Israel in 1948 and thei descendants have the right to return an reclaim lost property. This past summe the dispute heated up when Arutz Shev published a Bedein op-ed claimin UNRWA sponsored programs based o implementing the "law of return," eve through violence.

Arutz Sheva published UNRWA response in which a UN "spokesma vehemently denied it."

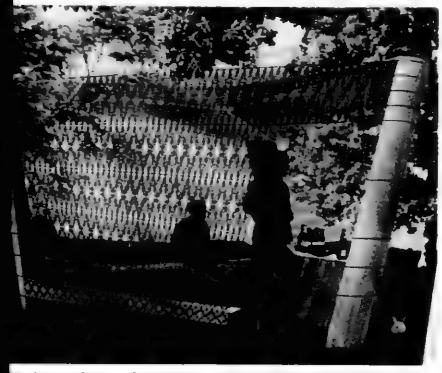
Competition aims to re-imagine the sukkah

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

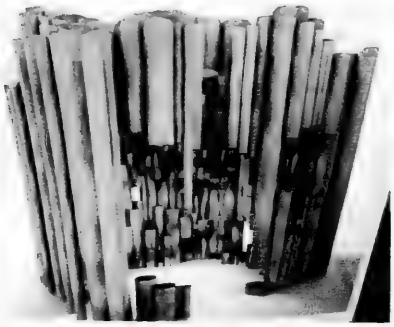
Kehilla Residential Programme's design competition, Sukkahville, which challenged entrants to re-imagine the sukkah, has attracted about 18 design proposals.

The challenge, inspired by New York City's Sukkah City, was sent out to architects, artists, builders and students in related disciplines.

"We tried to inspire entrants to renew the sukkah, a temporary shelter or dwelling, and raise awareness about affordable housing, homelessness and poverty," said Nancy Singer, executive director of Kehilla, the official housing agency of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.



Twist and Knot by Kathleen Cayetano and Melissa Lui



Sukkah Shift by Virginia Melnyk

William Lviathan by Stephen Taylor

She said that in Toronto, 76,549 households are on the waiting list for social housing, "and we [want people to know] about the realities of affordable housing issues [in the city.]"

Entrants were asked to adhere to a number of rules, including designing the roof from a natural material that during the day provides more shade than sunlight, and in the evening allows stars to be visible.

As well, the roof must be fully detached from any tree, branch or plant, and may not be tightly secured with wire.

The sukkah walls must be sturdy enough to withstand a steady wind, and decorative elements can be introduced.

An awards ceremony will be held Oct. 11 at the Lipa Green Centre, and the five final designs, chosen by a panel of judges, will be constructed, and displayed to the public on the centre's grounds on Oct. 11 from noon to 9 p.m., and Oct. 12 from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m.

Singer said she hopes the competition will be the first instalment of an annual event, and that the public comes out to celebrate Sukkot and support the project.

Those interested in attending the evening awards ceremony, which includes music by Klezkonnection and a dessert reception, can e-mail sukkahville@rogers.com.

Abbas' true colours

The mission was moribund from the outset, doomed to fail by the duplicitous scheming and cunning guile of the man whom the august emissaries had been sent to meet. Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas had no intention of being persuaded. Moreover he cared little for the sensibilities of the leader reaching out to him, seeking his co-operation, yet again.

Abbas abjectly rebuffed what Ha'aretz described as "a last-ditch U.S. attempt to sway the Palestinian Authority away from its planned statehood bid at the United Nations and toward resumed negotiations with Israel."

Last week, U.S. President Barack Obama sent two special envoys, David Hale and Dennis Ross, to plead with Abbas to set aside his plan, at least temporarily, for UN endorsement of Palestinian independence. Abbas sent the emissaries back to Washington without the slightest sympathy for their pleas, nor, clearly, for the man who had sent them.

Worse, he was quite derisive in dismissing the Americans. "David Hale and Dennis Ross came with a paper that was the last straw that he [Abbas] could take," said Abbas' spokesperson, Nabil Sha'ath.

And worst, Abbas changed what had been the presumed former tack of his plan, namely a resolution in the General Assembly, to one in the Security Council, where Obama would be forced to use his veto against the ostensible wishes of the majority of nations in the General Assembly.

Two days after Abbas rejected the American overture, he also turned down new proposals by Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu for bringing the Palestinians back to the negotiating table.

According to Ha'aretz, Netanyahu agreed to several compromises suggested by the Quartet (comprising the United States, Russia, the European Union and the UN) on specific issues such as the recognition of Israel as a Jewish state, the proposed borders of a future Palestinian state, security assurances and the length of time of future talks.

Ha'aretz further reported that "one U.S. proposal handed to Abbas [was] to ask the UN secretary general and the Security Council that Palestine be accepted as a full UN member on condition that the membership is processed for a period of several months, at which time direct talks between Israel and the PA could resume along guidelines stipulated by the Quartet." Abbas rejected that offer as well.

The pattern is clear.

The PA leader is intent on bringing the conflict to a further crisis. He has raised Palestinian expectations to sky-high levels. He has called for his people to demonstrate their support for his policies with en masse marches. He has not spurned Hamas, nor Hamas' objectives. He has spurned only direct negotiations. He has, in effect, shown his true colours: shadowy and dark.

25 years ago in The CJN

The creation of an international body that would confront terrorism was proposed to prime minister Brian Mulroney by Israeli prime minister Shimon Peres during talks between the two leaders on Parliament Hill.

Comedy relief

Hats off to Peter Farkas for his tongue-in-cheek commentary on Yosef Tastassa's Aug. 25 article, "Israelis will suffer from Palestinian independence" ("Palestinian independence," letters, Aug. 15). Farkas' summation of liberal/leftist "wisdom" on the Middle East situation is one of the more brilliant pieces of satire I've come across, distilling as it does the liberal left's utter denial of reality on the ground (such as the Hamas Charter's commitment to the obliteration of Israel), its insistence that the lack of a Palestinian state is Israel's fault (I had to wipe my eyes on that one) and, of course, all those "road blocks" that wicked Israel keeps throwing up (unlike the roadblock of Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat refusing to sign the document he had negotiated that would have created a Palestinian state). I don't normally look to The CJN for comedy relief, but this diversion was most welcome.

Christian supporters of Israel

The flames of antisemitism are being fanned, once again, and Israel is under siege, yet Rabbi Dow Marmur is concerned about prominent Jews who express their appreciation of the intensely pro-Israel support of Christians United for Israel ("You can't love Jews if you hate Judaism," Sept. 8). Rabbi Marmur is troubled by the motivation of those who want to bring all Jews to their homeland to prepare them to embrace Jesus upon his return. Would that the Christians in Germany of the 1930s and 1940s had that same goal.

Day school subsidies

In the article "Day school tuition fees on the rise... again" (Sept. 8), Paul Shaviv, of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, says that no children are turned away on financial grounds, provided "parents are prepared to allocate an appropriate place for [tuition] in their family budget." In the interest of transparency and honesty, CHAT and the federation, which funds parts of these subsidies, should explain exactly what that "appropriate place" is, as what families have to sacrifice to qualify is often considerable, and heart-wrenching decisions often have to be made. It is disrespectful to cast families who cannot make those sacrifices as basically not valuing Jewish education enough, which is what this terminology does. Also, Eric Petersiel, head of school at Leo Baeck Day School, notes that "parents are delaying entry to day school in favour of sending their children to junior and senior kindergarten at local public schools." It should be explicitly noted that this is because federation and some schools do not offer subsidies for kindergarten.

'We' were not consulted

I read with interest the column "No time to lose confronting many pressing problems" (Sept. 8), by Shimon Fogel, explaining how "we" launched the new Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA). While I personally know and totally respect the commitment of many of our community leaders, I think Fogel's article displays an attitude that is disconcerting. He talks about the grassroots empowerment and how "we" have discerned the best practices for forging a new path. He notes how the estimated 100,000 contributors to federations have made CIJA one of the most representative bodies in the country. I am not sure who are the "we" Fogel refers to repeatedly. I have been a donor to UJA, as I fondly remember it, annually for about 40 years, and between you and me, Mr. Fogel, I don't feel part of the "we." No one asked me who I wanted to represent me or what my priorities are. Maybe if you gave me or the other 99,999 donors a forum to voice an opinion, we would have something to add and would feel more part of the "we."

Bernie Madoff

To comment that "Madoff has paid the price" is hugely disrespectful of the legions of people who would like a warm bed and a decent meal guaranteed for life ("Madoff doc delves into Ponzi scam," Sept. 8). I'm not implying that prison is a good place to live, but this is an inappropriate, unnecessary comment. As an aside, I'm lucky enough to have not been one of his victims, but I know many who have.

Competition aims to re-imagine the sukkah

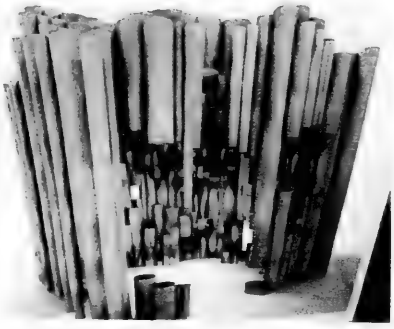
Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Kehilla Residential Programme's design competition, Sukkahville, which challenged entrants to re-imagine the sukkah, has attracted about 18 design proposals.

The challenge, inspired by New York City's Sukkah City, was sent out to architects, artists, builders and students in related disciplines.

"We tried to inspire entrants to renew the sukkah, a temporary shelter or dwelling, and raise awareness about affordable housing, homelessness and poverty," said Nancy Singer, executive director of Kehilla, the official housing agency of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Twist and Knot by Kathleen Cayetano and Melissa Lui



Sukkah Shift by Virginia Melnyk

William Lviathan by Stephen Taylor

She said that in Toronto, 76,549 households are on the waiting list for social housing, "and we [want people to know] about the realities of affordable housing issues [in the city.]"

Entrants were asked to adhere to a number of rules, including designing the roof from a natural material that during the day provides more shade than sunlight, and in the evening allows stars to be visible.

As well, the roof must be fully detached from any tree, branch or plant, and may not be tightly secured with wire.

The sukkah walls must be sturdy enough to withstand a steady wind, and decorative elements can be introduced.

An awards ceremony will be held Oct. 11 at the Lipa Green Centre, and the five final designs, chosen by a panel of judges, will be constructed, and displayed to the public on the centre's grounds on Oct. 11 from noon to 9 p.m., and Oct. 12 from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m.

Singer said she hopes the competition will be the first instalment of an annual event, and that the public comes out to celebrate Sukkot and support the project.

Those interested in attending the evening awards ceremony, which includes music by Klezkonnection and a dessert reception, can e-mail sukkahville@rogers.com.

Embassy attack stokes Israeli fears

Linda Gradstein
JTA

Retired Israeli Air Force pilot Uri Dromi remembers the day 34 years ago when Egyptian president Anwar Sadat landed in Israel to tell the Israeli people that he was ready to make peace.

Dromi, who had flown missions in the 1967 Six Day War against Egypt, had been assigned to escort the Egyptian air crew during Sadat's visit.

"I was standing there on the tarmac, and suddenly there's this big airliner with Egyptian markings being escorted by three Israeli jet fighters," Dromi told JTA. "It turns and lands. The door opens and there stands Anwar Sadat, who until then had been the leader of our greatest enemy. This is one of the moments I will always cherish."

Today, Dromi, who runs the Mishkenot Sha'ananim conference centre in Jerusalem and organizes briefings for journalists, is worried that the historic peace between Egypt and Israel could be unravelling.

The recent attack on the Israeli Embassy in Cairo by a mob of thousands of Egyptians has him worried.

"I think it is serious because there's a lot of energy there," Dromi said. "The anti-Israel sentiment was always there, but it was marginal compared to the problems Egyptians had. Now Egyptians are expressing all of their anger and frustration against Israel."

The embassy attack, during which a mob pulled down the embassy walls, broke into the building and rampaged for several hours while six Israeli security guards were trapped inside, was the latest and perhaps most worrisome in a series of events south of the border that have Israel concerned that it faces a game-changer with the new Egypt.

Most worrisome, some Israeli officials said, was their inability to reach senior Egyptian officials quickly. Instead they had to rely on U.S. mediation.

"There were difficulties in reaching certain Egyptian officials," a senior Israeli official told JTA. "And the real difficulty was that even when they were finally reached, their promises for quick intervention did not materialize as quickly as the situation required."

Egyptian commandos eventually arrived to rescue the trapped Israelis, and Israel sent its air force jets to retrieve them and bring them home. The official said he does not expect the embassy to reopen soon but that there are contacts with Egyptian security officials.

"We are discussing how to ensure that such an attack will never happen again and what is needed to be done to secure the reopening of the embassy," he said. "We are definitely worried. Which way Egypt is going is anybody's guess."

The Egyptian military council running the country quickly condemned the attack, called the rioters "criminals" and said it would launch criminal proceedings against those caught.

"The Egyptian leadership said they are committed to the peace treaty, and so are we," Israeli government spokesperson Mark Regev told JTA. "Anyone over 50 remembers the Egyptian-Israeli wars in which thousands of people on both sides of the frontier were killed. I don't think the people of Israel or Egypt want to go back to that."

The 32-year-old peace treaty between Israel and Egypt is one of the cornerstones of Israel's security doctrine. While it has resulted in few people-to-people ties, the pact made Israel's southern border reliably quiet and freed up Israel's military to focus on threats elsewhere.

"We've always had a saying that without Egypt there's no war and without Syria there's no peace," said Yehuda Ben Meir, an analyst at the INSS think-tank at Tel Aviv University. "Even when relations were cold, the peace treaty was solid."

Under Hosni Mubarak, who ruled Egypt from Sadat's assassination in 1981 until he was deposed early this year, Egypt established military and intelligence co-operation with Israel. Both Egypt and Israel viewed Hamas' growing strength warily, and Egyptian security forces tried to stop the smuggling of weapons and terrorists from the Sinai into Hamas-ruled Gaza. Since Mubarak's ouster, Israeli intelligence officials say, smuggling has dramatically increased.

Many Israelis fear that the peace treaty signed between Egypt and Israel may be rescinded by the new governing Egyptian regime. The photo recalls the storied moment on the lawn of the White House in 1979 when Egyptian President Anwar Sadat, left, U.S. President Jimmy Carter and Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin embraced after signing the peace treaty. [IGPO photo]

Despite a recent poll showing that more than half of Egyptians would support severing ties with Israel, most Israeli experts don't believe Egypt will rush to abrogate its peace treaty with Israel. Most of the Egyptian political factions, including the Muslim Brotherhood, have said they will continue the peace treaty. Cutting off ties also would threaten the $3 billion in foreign aid that Egypt receives annually from the United States.

But Israel is concerned. The attack on the embassy came just weeks after a terrorist attack on the border between Israel and Egypt that left eight Israelis dead. Israeli officials said the terrorists travelled from Gaza to Egypt and then into Israel. Three Egyptian security officers were killed inadvertently in firefights after the attack.

"Peace with Egypt has always been a cornerstone of our strategic position in the region," Dromi said. "Whatever else happened with Lebanon or Syria, we always had that peace to offset everything else. If this falls, there could be a chain reaction. We're already hearing rhetoric from Jordan that we haven't heard in a very long time."

King Abdullah of Jordan, which is the only other Arab country besides Egypt that has a formal peace treaty with Israel, said this week that "Jordan and the future of the Palestinian people are in better shape than Israel today. Now it is Israel that is fearful."

Israeli officials said they are working hard to repair relations with Egypt. But Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu last week also ordered Israel to speed up construction on a fence being built between Israel and the Sinai to try to stop smuggling. He said construction will finished by September 2012.

"Israel's border with Egypt is a border of peace," Netanyahu said while visiting the area. "To continue the peace, there must be security and to this end a fence is necessary. Its rapid construction is important for both peace and security."

Israel-Egypt peace treaty to be revised?

Barak Ravid
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Foreign Ministry summoned Egypt's ambassador to Israel to a meeting on Friday morning, in order to clarify remarks made by Egypt's prime minister that the Israel-Egypt peace treaty should be revised.

A source in the Foreign Ministry said that Foreign Ministry Director General Rafi Barak requested clarifications over the remarks, especially considering previous contradictory remarks made by the Egypt's military council that the peace treaty should be preserved.

During the meeting, Barak told Egypt's ambassador to Israel, Yasser Rida, that Israel was not satisfied that the Egyptian youth who took down the flag from Israel's embassy in Cairo last week is being presented as a hero in Egypt, despite the fact that this act is against the international treaty to which Egypt is a signatory.

Tensions in Egypt-Israel relations heightened recently when hundreds of Egyptian protesters broke down parts of a protective concrete wall outside the building housing the Israeli embassy in Cairo. During the attack, a protester pulled down the Israeli flag from the embassy building.

Although 80 Israeli members of staff, including Israel's ambassador to Egypt Yitzhak Levanon, had been evacuated from the building preceding the attack, six security guards and embassy workers were inside the building when the destructive demonstration took place.

It is still unclear when Levanon will return to the Cairo embassy.

Israeli protests herald real change

It's been quite a summer here in Israel. Palestinians, Turks and Egyptians are all in action. We await the UN vote on Palestinian statehood and its ramifications. Israel's ambassadors to Ankara and Cairo have been diplomatically and somewhat-less-than-diplomatically expelled.

Syria's Bashar Assad has his own problems, but won't miss an opportunity to shift hostilities from himself to Israel if he can. Jordan's King Abdullah might yet join the fray. And one wonders how long Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad will remain idle watching Turkey, under Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan, as it tries to gain regional and Islamic superpower status, mainly by harassing and threatening Israel.

Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

In one of his first public appearances after being appointed head of the Home-front Command, freshman IDF Maj.-Gen. Eyal Eisenberg expressed a doomsday assessment that the Arab Spring will be followed by a winter of radical Islam, increasing the probability of a multi-front war that might include the use of weapons of mass destruction.

The following day, Amos Gilad, director of policy and political-military Affairs at the Ministry of Defence (and himself a retired major general), provided his appraisal that Israel's security situation has never been better.

Neither general got it right – the truth is somewhere in between – and both should have kept their opinions to themselves, allowing political leaders to actually lead. That, however, is something our present government loathes doing.

Given this seemingly dismal state of affairs, it's quite remarkable that for many Israelis, this has actually been a summer of promise and optimism. For the first time in eons, matters relating to how we live our lives and how our children will live theirs are being viewed as on par with those regarding security and foreign affairs.

In mid-June, Itzik Elrov, a 25-year-old haredi cantor from Bnei Brak, went shopping for cottage cheese, a staple in almost all Israeli homes. He was shocked by its price and after doing some research, he discovered the cost of a standard container had risen unreasonably from less than five to roughly eight shekels in just three years. Using Facebook, Itzik initiated a campaign calling for a cottage cheese boycott starting July 1. He was quickly joined by more than 100,000 people.

After Knesset deliberations and a public outcry, the country's three major dairy conglomerates, which together basically monopolize the industry, cut cottage cheese prices back to their 2008 levels.

Soon afterward, Daphni Leef, a 25-year-old video editor from Tel Aviv whose rental lease had ended, started another Facebook page, this one calling on other young people having trouble finding reasonably priced housing to join her in pitching tents on Rothschild Boulevard in an up-market area of Tel Aviv.

What ensued is history in the making. Thousands joined Daphni, in Tel Aviv and in tens of other tent clusters around the country, in what is now called the Tents Protest.

Complaints about food and real estate costs broadened into discussions about the growing disparity between rich and poor, the quality of health care and public education, and the need to limit and better regulate cartels and to reform our tax codes – in short, to make life better for hard-working people.

The Tents Protest broadened into mass demonstrations on successive weekends culminating on a warm Saturday night earlier this month, when almost 500,000 Israelis gathered at rallies around the country demanding basic changes in national priorities and a gentler, more sensitive form of capitalism – real social justice.

The movement has been criticized for being naïve and unfocused. Some say its leaders don't know what they want and aren't representative enough of Israel's divergent interest groups. But the government, understanding the movement's widespread support, has responded by establishing a committee tasked with quickly proposing changes with short- and long-term effects.

Standing with my kids among these young people during several demonstrations, I felt I was participating in protests that might really make a difference – that will succeed. And I felt we have young people who really care about Israel's future and want to do something about it.

At one of these rallies, someone held up a sign quoting the title of the 1980s pop hit Walk Like an Egyptian, referring to successful anti-Mubarak demonstrations in Egypt earlier this year.

Given the recent anti-Israel violence in Cairo, I doubt we'll see that sign again any time soon.

The Durban war, 10 years on

Ten years ago, under the façade of universal human rights and anti-racism, 1,500 NGOs (non-governmental organizations) claiming to promote moral values created the foundation for their own destruction. With such human rights stalwarts as Iran, Libya and Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, the United Nation's NGO Forum of the Durban World Conference Against Racism targeted Israel as an "apartheid state," guilty of "war crimes" and "genocide." Having failed to destroy Israel through invasions and terror, this delegitimization became the next stage of the ongoing war.

In the past decade, the Durban strategy has expanded the tactics of intimidation, "lawfare" and boycotts that target Israel. Through the façade of expertise and "research," they turned defence against mass terror into "massacres" in Jenin, an "apartheid wall" and war crimes in Gaza, as published in the discredited Goldstone report. Palestinians are always defined as victims, and their terror attacks are patronizingly ignored.

The Canadian government at the time (Jean Chrétien was prime minister) and the diplomats in the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade (DFAIT) played a major role in the Durban fiasco. These Canadian officials had blind faith in the idea of the United Nations (as distinct from the reality) and in the unelected leaders of powerful NGOs that exploited moral language. Along with the U.S.-based Ford Foundation and the European Union, Canadian taxpayers funded the diplomatic, NGO and youth forums of the Durban conference.

In the decade since Durban, the strategy of political warfare has done significant damage, both to Israel and to universal human rights. In March 2002, following a series of murderous Palestinian suicide bombings, the IDF went to the centre of the terror network in Jenin in Operation Defensive Shield. The propagandists immediately spread false reports of a "massacre," including a high-level official of Amnesty International speaking as an "expert" on the BBC. Human Rights Watch issued "research reports" with false accusations of Israeli "war crimes," and the UN Commission on Human Rights held "emergency" meetings to condemn Israel. Journalists, diplomats, and then academics from around the world repeated the accusations without bothering to check the facts or noticing their absence.

Using this justification, the academic boycott of Israel was launched, immorally invoking and exploiting the South African apartheid analogy that is central to the Durban strategy and political warfare. This was later expanded to the BDS – boycotts, divestment and sanctions – movement. The objective, as stated clearly and repeatedly, was not to support peace through a two-state agreement, but rather to end Israeli "occupation" since 1948 – in other words, to destroy the Jewish nation-state.

This pattern of false "war-crimes" accusations used to justify BDS campaigns and other forms of discrimination against Israel has continued and expanded. The alliance between the Arab regimes that control the UN human rights agenda and the radical NGOs, including dozens of European-funded groups that operate out of Israel but have almost no Israeli supporters, is central. This alliance followed the same script in the 2006 Lebanon war, the Gaza war two years later, and the 2010 "Free Gaza" flotilla provocation.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

After the Liberals lost power and Stephen Harper became prime minister, Canada largely ended its funding for the NGOs involved in the Durban strategy and disavowed the delusion of the United Nations as a moral force. However, some Canadian ex-diplomats and pundits cling to this myth.

There are some signs that the Canadian-led awakening on the reality behind the UN and NGO human rights façade is spreading, and that the Durban alliance has overplayed its hand. The UN's 2009 Durban Review conference – held in Geneva – did not agree to or fund another NGO forum, and the third Durban conference, on Sept. 22 in New York, will be largely ignored. In both cases, Canada was the first nation to announce that it would not participate, and other nations followed.

The extremist BDS movement is also faltering. Violent boycotters who disrupted an Israel Philharmonic Orchestra performance in London, England, and hooligans in Melbourne, Australia, who blocked customers from entering an Israeli-owned chocolate store, have triggered backlashes.

"Buy-cotts" of Israeli products are more successful than boycotts. On some university campuses, student groups are getting better at exposing crude anti-Israel propaganda. And funding for false-flag human rights groups is decreasing as donors follow Canada's lead. These are important signs of progress in the difficult Durban war.

Germany's ties with Israel remain strong

Israel can count on at least one country, the United States, to veto a Palestinian unilateral declaration of independence and application for full membership when, according to the latest reports, that contentious motion is presented to the United Nations' Security Council later this week by the president of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmoud Abbas.

If the United States vetoes the motion as widely expected, the Palestinians might well take their case to the General Assembly, where a majority of nations favour the Palestinian position. Israel would then expect its friends, including Germany, Israel's chief ally in Europe, to vote against the proposal.

But can Israel rely on Germany? No one can be sure, since Angela Merkel, the German chancellor, has yet to make a final decision. "They've taken a wait-and-see approach," said Asaf Ichilevich, the first secretary and foreign policy advisor at Israel's embassy in Berlin, earlier this month.

Judging by her comments and those of her foreign minister, Guido Westerwelle, Germany is likely to disappoint the Palestinians should the issue ultimately land in the General Assembly.

Merkel, who has firmly upheld Israel's special relationship with Germany, has warned that "unilateral measures" would be unhelpful, and she has urged the Palestinians to return to negotiations with Israel. Westerwelle, while voicing support for a two-state solution and the right of the Palestinians to statehood, has said that unilateral steps "could be counter-productive."

Their views, however soothing to the current Israeli government of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, do not appear to coincide with German public opinion. A YouGov survey published on Sept. 12 indicates that 76 per cent of Germans believe that Germany should support a unilateral Palestinian declaration of statehood.

If Germany lines up behind Israel vis-à-vis this motion, it will not be the first time Germany has sided with the Jewish state.

Apparently reacting to a chorus of pressure from the World Jewish Congress and the Simon Wiesenthal Center, Westerwelle recently announced that Germany, in concert with nine other countries, notably Canada, the United States, Italy and the Netherlands, would boycott the UN-sponsored Durban III anti-racism conference, scheduled to start on Sept. 22 in New York City. In explaining his stance, Westerwelle said that it might be misused yet again to propagate antisemitism, and noted that Germany's pullout from Durban was "an expression of our special responsibility toward Israel."

With these succinct words, Westerwelle went to the heart of the matter.

Sheldon Kirshner in Berlin

Ever since West Germany formally established diplomatic relations with Israel in 1965, when the Holocaust was still a fresh wound and a jolting memory, Germany has formed a strong and unwavering relationship with Israel cutting across political, economic, scientific, military and cultural realms and enjoying bipartisan support in parliament.

Horst Kohler, then Germany's president, elaborated on this theme on a state visit to Israel in 2005, saying Germany was committed to "ensuring that Israel can live within internationally recognized borders, free of fear and terror."

When he was Germany's foreign minister, Joschka Fischer said that Israel's security was "a cornerstone" of its policy.

Merkel has continued this tradition. As she once put it, "For us, relations with Israel are a precious treasure that we must preserve. We, and the coming generations, must therefore be aware of our history and the responsibility it entails. We must take a clear and public stand about maintaining close relations with the Jewish community in Germany and, of course, close relations with Israel ..."

Three and a half years ago, in the first speech delivered by a German chancellor in the Knesset, Merkel declared that the Holocaust – conceived and implemented by Germans during the Nazi period – link Germany and Israel "in a very special way."

The ties that bind Germany with Israel are based on shared western values and beliefs and a common historical perspective.

Since signing a landmark compensation agreement with Israel in 1952, Germany has paid out a reported $36 billion in reparation payments to Israel and Holocaust survivors around the world.

Mutual state visits are a regular occurrence, and in 2008, in honour of Israel's 60th anniversary, Germany and Israel launched joint cabinet meetings. Germany is Israel's largest trading partner in Europe. Scientific, educational, cultural and youth exchanges have become commonplace, and two-way tourism is booming.

Military co-operation, dating back to the 1960s, is extensive today. Israel's Merkava tank is powered by a German engine and Germany deploys Israeli anti-tank missiles and Heron spy drones.

The Israeli navy currently operates three German-manufactured Dolphin-class submarines, reportedly capable of firing nuclear warheads. Last May, Israel finalized the purchase of three more Dolphins, which replace Israel's obsolete Gal models.

Last year, the commander of Germany's armed forces, Gen. Volker Wieker, visited Israel, paying a visit to Yad Vashem, the Holocaust memorial, museum and school.

Germany has agreed to sell 200 Leopard tanks to Saudi Arabia, but Israel does not object to the sale, as it did when the transaction was first mooted in 1981. "It's not seen as a real threat to Israel," an Israeli diplomat said. During the 1991 Gulf War, Germany supplied Israel with Patriot anti-missile missiles.

In recent years, Israel has entrusted German negotiators with the task of trying to find the downed Israeli aviator Ron Arad and working to win the release of an Israeli citizen held by Hezbollah and an Israeli soldier still imprisoned by Hamas.

Germany has been a key player in efforts to deny Iran nuclear weapons. Germany has also condemned remarks by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad that Israel should be destroyed.

Germany is Iran's second-biggest trading partner in Europe after Italy. By all accounts, 1,700 German companies are active in Iran. But Germany's trade with Iran has been shrinking in the last few years and shrank by a further 18 per cent in the first six months of 2011. According to the Israeli Embassy in Berlin, the German government actively discourages commercial relations with Iran and German export controls are stringent.

In the European Union, Germany is a staunch defender of Israel. Germany objected to a EU call in 2002 to impose economic sanctions on Israel. Germany backed Israel's construction of a separation barrier on security grounds.

But in accordance with EU policy, Germany has criticized Israel for building and expanding settlements in the West Bank. Recently, Germany reportedly pressured Deutsche Bahn International to withdraw from a project to build a rail line from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem because six kilometres of it passes through the West Bank.

Germany, too, has called on Israel to lift the siege of the Gaza Strip, controlled by Hamas since 2007.

Last February, in a heated telephone exchange, Merkel accused Netanyahu of failing to take "a single step to advance peace." In response, Netanyahu went to Berlin in an attempt to smooth over their sharp differences.

Germany and Israel fundamentally disagree over this pivotal issue, but their bilateral relations remain as vital as ever and are intrinsically intact.

Ground broken on Jewish war vet memorial

David Grossman
Special to The CJN

At one time, it was considered a grandiose project.

Cabinet ministers, senators and former Toronto mayor David Miller said a monument to honour Jews who died while serving in the Canadian armed forces during World War I and II and the Korean War would be the most significant memorial to be erected in Canada in 50 years.

Unfortunately, it never happened.

For almost 10 years, there has been aggravation, confusion and disarray for those who wanted nothing more than to honour a group that had gone largely unrecognized.

Finally, this year, on the 10th anniversary of the Sept. 11 terror attacks, a small group from the Jewish War Veterans of Canada, Toronto Post, broke ground on a project that will commemorate the sacrifices others made for freedom.

Amek Adler, a Holocaust survivor and vice-chair of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada, was the first of many to tip his shovel in the soil in a ceremony at the Lipa Green Centre for Jewish Community Services.

The monument is a joint effort between UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Jewish War Veterans, Toronto Post. Donations will to help cover the total cost, as will the contribution of ScotiaBank, the major corporate sponsor.

There was some emotion as several veterans reminisced about days past in front of a small group of about 50 people who had gathered to pay their respects.

A larger ceremony that will unveil the actual monument – now under construction at a cost of about $75,000 – is set for the morning of Remembrance Day.

The project is far less expensive than the original one, an ambitious, $7-million work of art that was announced six years ago and was to be built by a renowned architect. Many issues got in the way, including internal squabbles and the big question of who would do the fundraising.

The monument slated to be unveiled Nov. 11 will bear no resemblance to the original, but it will carry a powerful message and may even be more appealing.

About eight feet long and six feet high, it will be an oval-shaped structure made of black granite supported by large rock boulders on each side, with Canadian and Israeli flags.

One side of the memorial will contain the names of 570 Canadian Jewish soldiers killed in action in World War I and II and the Korean War.

In total, 1.5 million Jews, including some 17,000 Canadians, served with the Allies during World War II.

"As a Holocaust survivor, I cry," Adler said. "But I cry just as much knowing that, after all these years, we will finally have a memorial to salute those who gave their lives so we can live in freedom.

"It has been a bumpy road. We have no money. All we wanted was a home to remember those who fought for this country. We were determined to establish a monument to live on – and we are grateful to those who stuck with us – our board, the UJA and those who contributed financially to make this happen."

Joseph Warner, a Jewish war veteran who was a pilot in the Royal Canadian Air Force saluted his colleagues.

"The tenacity of our veterans who would not let this go – it was amazing," Warner said. "Our membership is getting old, and there are times when we have to cross the name of someone off our list. Look, these wars were a long time ago. If someone doesn't do something, who will?

"Our younger generations don't know our backgrounds, and a history lesson is badly needed. I am sure that this will help. Have we not waited long enough to pay tribute to people who deserve it?"

For the past eight months, a Toronto Post working committee comprising Mike Brown, Everett Bluestein and Adler pushed ahead with the support of the federation.

"It's a solemn time and also one of celebration," said Norm Gardner, a former city councillor and chair of the Toronto Police Services board who has served in the Canadian Armed Forces and was a reserve member of the Queen's Own Rifles of Canada.

"It's the culmination of something that should have been done many years ago. When I hear people say Jews never fought in the war, they're being ignorant only because they don't know. This will help change that."

SCOT helps strengthen Jewish connections

The Sephardic Community of Toronto (SCOT), an organization that celebrates Sephardic culture and aims to strengthen connections with other Jewish communities in Toronto, held its second annual SCOT summer bash at Lakehurst Park, behind the Sephardic Kehila Centre, on Sept. 11. About 250 parents and their children were treated to a barbecue, bouncing castles, snow cones and face-painting.

Developer pledges $1 million to Chabad

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Larry Robbins, a real estate developer and board leader of the Erin Mills Development Corporation, recently pledged more than $1 million to Chabad of Mississauga for an endowment fund earmarked for educational programs.

He has promised $1,080,000 in seed money for the Robbins Family Endowment Fund, because, he told The CJN in a phone interview, the amount is "six times 180,000. I do everything with chai. Even in business, I try to work it out to chai."

As well, he admires Rabbi Yitzchok Slavin and his wife, Sara, for their hard work in building something "from nothing," and for the services they provide to the Jewish community in Mississauga, Brampton, Hamilton, Milton and Oakville.

By coincidence or serendipity, Rabbi Slavin, who started Chabad of Mississauga in 2003, lives on the first street that Robbins built in the area almost three decades ago.

The two men have a relationship that dates back about five years, when Rabbi Slavin first called Robbins because he had heard that Robbins and his wife, Miriam, who has since died, had a Torah they wanted to donate.

Larry Robbins, left, and Rabbi Yitzchok Slavin in 2008 when the Erin Mills Development Corporation helped Chabad of Mississauga with its second mortgage.

Miriam's father, the late Rabbi Isaac Aronoff, ran a shul in his home, and the Torah had belonged to him.

The couple donated the Torah to Chabad of Mississauga (also known as Chabad in Erin Mills), and the rabbi subsequently asked Robbins for advice on buying a building. Chabad is now located in a 6,300-foot facility on Dundas St. called the Turk Family Chabad Jewish Discovery Centre.

The two men developed a friendship, Robbins told The CJN.

Robbins – via the Erin Mills Development Corporation at the time – also helped the congregation when its second mortgage came due. As well, Chabad's Hebrew School is named for Miriam Robbins.

"Above all, our focus is on education," Rabbi Slavin said in a news release.

Likewise, education was important to Miriam Robbins. In large part for that reason, Robbins was a benefactor to United Synagogue Day School last year, and it was renamed Robbins Hebrew Academy.

Rabbi Slavin told The CJN that, although Mississauga and Oakville each had a Reform temple when he arrived (a small Conservative congregation was established in the area a year later), there was a large population of unaffiliated Jewish people in the area.

He knew only two people in the community at the time and started running services in his basement.

Today, Rabbi Slavin said, Chabad of Mississauga has a mailing list of almost 500 people, and an average Shabbat morning attendance of about 30 people. Last year, between 70 and 95 people attended High Holiday services.

Over the years, hundreds of people have come through his doors, the rabbi said, referring to attendees of Hebrew school, adult education programs, and summer day camp in addition to religious services.

Robbins' gift will put all the educational programs "under one umbrella," Rabbi Slavin said. As well, he added, it will enable Chabad to create more educational options for people of all ages. A new teens' club and a new Mommy & Me program will also offer Judaic-related education.

For Chabad of Mississauga, which doesn't charge membership dues, the fund offers some security, although it will provide only 15 to 18 per cent of its annual budget, Rabbi Slavin said.

A gala dinner to honour Robbins and pay tribute to his wife's memory is planned for mid-2012, when the new institute will be formally dedicated.

Beth Tikvah honours founding rabbi

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Avraham Feder and his late wife, Leona, were honoured this past Sunday by Beth Tikvah Synagogue, where the chapel is being named in their honour.

The personable 80-year-old rabbi, who remarried four years ago, still has a strong connection with the synagogue, where he was founding rabbi. Thirty years ago, he made aliyah and went on to lead a congregation in Jerusalem, where he is now also rabbi emeritus. As well, he has headed the rabbinic program at the Schechter Institute for Jewish Studies and taught chazzanut at Bar-Ilan University.

Beth Tikvah's rabbi and chazzan for its first 14 years, Rabbi Feder has been leading the shul's alternate High Holiday services for the past 30 years. Until two years ago, he also returned to Toronto in the spring to lecture and sing in concert.

Merle Goldman, a past president of Beth Tikvah and a member since 1969, told The CJN that Rabbi Feder was "like the Pied Piper of that community," shaping the congregation with his love for music, education and Israel.

Rabbi Avraham Feder
[Frances Kraft photo]

As well, she said, he is a "great raconteur" who used to draw adults and children alike to Sukkot services to hear his "Tzaki" stories, three of which are about to be published in book form.

The childrens' stories, which became a Beth Tikvah tradition, can be traced back to Rabbi Feder's first Sukkot service at the shul. Although he had prepared a "very serious" sermon, he decided to ad lib when he saw the number of young children at the service, he recalled in an interview last week. Over time, he developed stories about a boy named Tzaki and his "flying magical sukkah."

A native of New York City, where his father was a cantor, Rabbi Feder worked briefly as a public school English teacher, then served as a cantor at two large congregations before entering the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary to study for rabbinic ordination. At the time, he was 29 and the father of two young children. A third was born in Toronto.

In addition to his smichah, the rabbi has a BA in English literature and education, a master's degree in Hebrew literature and another in sacred music, and a PhD in educational theory from the University of Toronto.

Rabbi Feder worked for the United Synagogue of America for two years before moving to Toronto to take his first rabbinic pulpit. The fledgling congregation of 100 families appealed to him, he said, and he looked forward to "building something" with them.

Having grown up in a modern Orthodox home, and having served Beth Tikvah, which is a traditional Conservative shul in orientation, before introducing full egalitarianism at his next congregation, Beit Knesset Moreshet Yisrael, it's clear his perspective has evolved.

"A person should change," Rabbi Feder said. "I think growth is based on the ability to change."

He believes that egalitarianism is "a vital issue," and said he can no longer buy "all the old reasoning that's been given in defence of the old traditional way."

The outspoken rabbi also stands by a 1977 statement he made, calling it a disgrace that, as he put it, "Orthodoxy [had] been increasingly boycotting meaningful dialogue with the Conservative and Reform."

The founder of MAOR, the foundation for Unity and Diversity in Jewish Life, Rabbi Feder remembers monthly meetings of Orthodox, Conservative and Reform in his early days in Toronto, where "not only major rabbis... but world-renowned leaders" would debate and argue.

A proponent of education, prayer and social action, Rabbi Feder said he would urge his former congregants to "reinvigorate themselves into a renewed commitment to those three areas."

Organ donation is a mitzvah

Rabbi Yonah Berman

A close friend of mine lost his father, Bob, in 2006, after a long and difficult battle with complications from diabetes. When Bob passed away, his family made the courageous decision to donate his liver, thereby saving the life of another man whose own liver was failing. Bob himself had received a kidney donation some 19 years earlier, thus returning the favour, as it were, at the time of his own passing.

One of the recent points of controversy in the Orthodox community has been the debate over organ donation. There is a widely held – albeit mistaken – belief, that Judaism does not permit organ donation. This is far from true.

Jewish tradition normally prohibits any act that would defile a corpse (bizui hamet). We therefore perform funerals and bury remains as soon as possible after an individual's death, and we avoid autopsies, unless they are required by law, such as in the case of a criminal investigation. However, Judaism sees the preservation of human life as one of its paramount values. The principle of pikuach nefesh (saving a human life) surpasses the observance of nearly all commandments, with the exception of cardinal sins involving murder, idolatry and certain sexual relationships.

It is clear that when someone's organs can be used to preserve or save the lives of others, Jewish law would not stand in the way of harvesting those organs. Furthermore, there may even be an ethical imperative to donate organs in such a case.

The current controversy does not surround the acceptability – and perhaps the ideal – of organ donation. Rather, it focuses on the issue of defining the moment of an individual's death, and, therefore, the permissibility to harvest his or her organs for transplantation at that time. Some rabbis follow the historic medical and halachic definition of death: the cessation of respiration and cardiac function (breathing and heartbeat). This approach limits which organs can be harvested from a donor, since the organs begin to degrade as soon as they stop receiving oxygen.

Rabbinic Reflections

Other rabbis side with the majority of modern physicians, defining death as the cessation of all brain function, known colloquially as "brain death." This approach allows for many more organs to be harvested, since the donor's body can remain connected to a respirator, maintaining circulation and, therefore, preserving the organs until transplant teams can harvest them. Whichever definition of death one follows, in consultation with his or her rabbi, one has the potential to be an organ donor upon their death.

Let me be clear: while there are questions regarding when organs may be taken from a donor, based on the dispute over the definition of death, Jewish tradition sees saving a person's life as a paramount mitzvah and an undeniable ethical responsibility.

I urge you to visit the Halachic Organ Donor Society's website (www.hods.org) to learn more about this important issue. You will see numerous Canadian and American community leaders and rabbis who are card-carrying members of this organization and who encourage others to join as well.

May all of God's children be blessed with long life and good health in the coming year and beyond.

Resolutions for the New Year

Life seems to get more and more complicated. In our complex society we often lose sight of helpful guideposts for living.

No one knows what 5772 will offer, but here are some resolutions that can bring an added dimension of meaning to our lives.

Cultivate the art of patience: The prayer of modern man runs as follows: "Dear God, I pray for patience and I want it right now." Patience makes for perfection. The great pianist Paderewski declared that if he missed practising for one day, he could tell the difference. If he missed practising for two days, his friends could tell the difference. And if he missed practise for three days, his audience could tell the difference. Patience is the hallmark of a civilized person who knows how to wait for the egg to hatch, the fruit to ripen, for the idea whose time has come.

Believe that you can make a difference: In every person there is something uniquely precious. No two faces are identical; no two sets of fingerprints are alike. Each person has to read his own book, blow his own nose, make his own love and say his own prayers.

It seems to be a law of nature that creative ideas do not arise from groups; they spring from individuals. The greatest argument against the suppression of individuality is that homogenized society doesn't allow the cream to rise.

Bookmarks
Bernard Baskin

Never lose your sense of wonder: Albert Einstein wrote: "The most beautiful thing we can experience is the mysterious. He to whom the emotion is a stranger, who can no longer pause to wonder and stand wrapped in awe, is as good as dead; his eyes are closed."

The larger island of knowledge, the longer the shoreline of wonder. It was Kant, the great philosopher who taught: "Two things fill the mind with every new and increasing wonder – the starry heavens above me and the moral law within." We are all born with a sense of wonder; how quickly most of us lose it.

Seek the wisdom to be found in books: Perhaps the best single test of a nation's culture remains what it has been since the days of Gutenberg – its attitude toward books. A house without books is like a room without windows. A good book is the precious lifeblood of a master spirit. Christopher Morley put it aptly: "When you sell a man a book, you don't sell him just 12 ounces of paper and ink and glue – you sell him a whole new life."

Strengthen your links with your Jewish identity: You share in a 4,000-year tradition. What will you do to keep it alive and vital? A Jew today is a part of a community of the "survival of the fittest." Your ancestors, in an unremitting struggle for Jewish survival, overcame the temptations, the trials, vicissitudes of an often hostile history. Strive to derive from Judaism something of its colour, drama, lore and wisdom that can lend beauty, purpose and spirit to your life.

Mixed reaction to advocacy overhaul

A cluster of recent articles in the National Post, the Toronto Star and The CJN seems to suggest that the transition from the Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy, the old CIJA, to its current incarnation, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, the new CIJA, has been somewhat controversial and much less seamless than might otherwise have been expected.

Though touted as "a model for any advocacy body in the world" (National Post, Sept. 1), the process of CIJA's reconfiguration has left many in the Jewish community with a sense of unease. Though the reasons for concern cover a broad and complex spectrum, depending on whose opinions are expressed, there are certain recurring themes that tend to command particular attention when discussing the changes that are about to become the new reality for Israel and Jewish advocacy in Canada.

One of these relates to the perceived lack of inclusivity as the restructuring began to unfold, while another has to do with doubts about community participation in the selection of the new CIJA's board of directors.

What needs to be addressed is whether there is any basis for these criticisms. So let's first look at the inclusivity issue. Did the Jewish community at large, in all of its diversity, have an opportunity to take part in the revamp? Those orchestrating the process have insisted again and again that this was so – that the "grassroots" was involved – but, in drilling down to the crux of what is defined as "grassroots" participation, we learn that "grassroots" really means, for the most part, "federations" or pockets of leadership in our non-federated communities.

My View

Lawrence Hart

Such leadership, whether federated on non-federated, invariably connotes the self-appointment of boards and committees, since there is hardly ever an election for these positions. Thus, in effect, only a relatively small segment of the community at large actually had access to the so-called Newco Document, which was the blueprint for the pending reforms. It's been reported, moreover, that when the media (even The CJN) wished to review the document, they were not permitted to do so, at least not until very late in the process.

When turning to the selection of the new CIJA's directors, we're assured that there were "elections" to the board, which, depending on interpretation, may have been the case. What needs to be disclosed, however, is how and when such elections took place, who was nominated and by whom, and what terms of reference govern particular board positions. It might also be explained how six out of the nine members of the CIJA reorganization committee got onto the board, with one of them listed as the "chair designate." More usually, members of such a committee – which in this instance was apparently also the de facto nominating committee – are not eligible to sit on the board that they are themselves proposing.

That the new CIJA seems to have gotten off to a rocky start is unfortunate. But unless the key issues that rile its critics are wisely and sensitively dealt with, more divisiveness is inevitable, and what was intended as a novel and constructive overhaul of our advocacy structure will flounder in a maelstrom of suspicion and unmet expectations.

Pursuing the perfect honey cake

Last time, we looked at why it seems that honey cake, despite being a famous Rosh Hashanah food, can't get no respect – at least from many Jewish food writers. Today, those same writers take up the challenge in pursuit of honey cakes they would be proud to serve on their own holiday tables.

"Every honey cake I have been forced to try has been wretched (apologies if it was yours)," writes Deb Perelman. So she decided to make things right. She had heard very good things about Marcy Goldman's recipe and decided to give it a whirl. Although the loaves had fallen (which Deb admits may be her own doing), she says, "This honey cake is perfect. It's warmly spiced and crazy moist and soft and plush with a little crisp edge about the corners..."And it most certainly lives up to its title, Majestic and Moist Honey Cake. [http://bit.ly/hnycake11]

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

Arthur Schwartz did some searching and sampling, and he says, perhaps with a dash of reluctance, that "the one I would most likely bake if I was forced to bake a honey cake is from Levana Kirschenbaum's new book, Levana's Table... She is Moroccan and her honey cake reflects her native cuisine's love of lavish seasoning. The cardamom in the recipe adds an exotic aroma. The ginger adds a good peppery bite to the aftertaste." [http://bit.ly/hnycake12]

If you'd like to add star power to your holiday kitchen, there is Nigella Lawson's Honey Chocolate Cake. [http://bit.ly/hnycake13] And you'd better get going if you'd like to bake Janna Gur's Magical Honey Cake because she advises: "Pay attention: the cake should 'mature' for seven days before serving." [http://bit.ly/hnycake15]

To pore over even more recipes, visit the Jewish-food Honeycake Archives, where you can sample 38 variations including Walnuts and Cinnamon, Australian and Almost Fat-Free. [http://bit.ly/hnycake16] At the RFCJ Recipe Archives, there's Honey Cheesecake, Alsatian Pain d'Épice, and Honey Blueberry. [http://bit.ly/hnycake17]

Although those recipes may be delicious, they still may not be right for all households, especially if you are baking for someone with a food allergy or sensitivity. Here's a recipe that calls for ghee, rice milk and an egg substitute. [http://bit.ly/hnycake18] And the Gluten-Free Bay website has a recipe for people who cannot tolerate gluten. [http://bit.ly/hnycake19]

Sometimes what makes a honeycake recipe truly special are not the eggs, the wheat or even honey but the memories that have gone into it. For Penny, those memories are definitely found in her Zadie's Orange Honey Cake.

"I have vivid memories of the two of us standing in his two-by-nothing kitchen in Kew Gardens Hills, N.Y., baking orange honey cake... I have taken it upon myself to keep making the orange honey cake for every Rosh Hashanah. I make it for my parents and my sister. They know if I don't make it, no one else will, because it was my special thing with my grandfather. I may not be the scholar my grandfather was... but I am helping to pass on the legacy that was my zaide. And I do this by making our cake." [http://bit.ly/hnycake20]

Temple Har Zion celebrates 40 years

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Temple Har Zion will kick off its year-long 40th anniversary celebrations this weekend with a nostalgic Shabbat service officiated by the synagogue's spiritual leader Rabbi Cory Weiss, emeritus Rabbi Michael Stroh and cantorial soloist Tara Abrams.

The service will incorporate all four prayer books that have been used throughout the temple's history, and will include current tunes as well as tunes used in the past, Debby Kaplan, chair of the 40th anniversary committee, told The CJN.

The synagogue will use its new multimedia system to project the liturgy.

Torah study with Washington-based Rabbi David Saperstein, director of the Union for Reform Judaism's Religious Action Center of Reform Judaism, will precede the service.

The day will also include a 3 p.m. reunion with activities for children, and an evening barbeque.

Ellen Morrow, chair of the reunion and a longtime member whose bat mitzvah was part of the temple's first service, said she is excited about the reunion. "We thought it would be such a nice way to start – to see old friends and celebrate how far we've come."

Pictures will be on display, and Morrow noted that a scanner will be on hand to make copies of memorabilia that people bring.

Over the years, the congregation has grown to almost 600 families from a core group of eight families in 1971. At the beginning, services were held in rented space in a local church.

In time, the synagogue bought a house, where Morrow – whose father Art Benjamin was the first director of the religious school – attended confirmation classes in Rabbi Stroh's study.

The founding families belonged to a young congregants group at Holy Blossom Temple who had moved north, Rabbi Stroh said. Originally, they asked Holy Blossom to consider opening a northern branch school for their young children, but the board advised them that they needed a new synagogue, not just a school, he recalled.

The founding families asked Rabbi Stroh, an associate rabbi at Holy Blossom at the time, to go with them and help start the congregation.

Holy Blossom provided financial assistance to get them off the ground, he said.

Retired since 2005, Rabbi Stroh said he had "a terrific 35 years."

He takes pride in the temple's longstanding adult education program, in which he still teaches. He credits congregants "who wanted to study in a very sophisticated way and were willing to stretch their heads."

As well, he mentioned Har Zion's social action programs including its ongoing hosting of homeless people through Out of the Cold.

In 2004, the temple and its neighbour, the Islamic Ja'affari Centre – known for their shared parking lot – won an award for their mutual respect and understanding.

Rabbi Weiss, who became rabbi of the temple five years ago, is particularly excited about the 40th anniversary Torah writing project, which kicks off Oct. 16.

He said that in addition to its adult education including weekly Shabbat Torah study, Har Zion is known for its music.

"We're a real learning congregation… And we're a very musical congregation," Rabbi Weiss said.

The rabbi, who has a bachelor of music and plays three instruments, added, "We love to incorporate music. It's a singing congregation."

A few of the year's events reflect that love of music: a Nov. 25 and 26 Shabbat with performer Josh Nelson as musician-in-residence, Shabbat Shira weekend Feb. 3 to 5 with Har Zion alum Alan Goodis as musician-in-residence, and a Daniel Pearl World Music Day event on Oct. 28, which will feature young musicians from the congregation.

Of the reunion events this weekend, RSVPs are required for the barbeque only, by Sept. 21, at 40threunion@templeharzion.com.

NCJW panel to discuss organ donation

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

The myths and misconceptions surrounding organ and tissue donation will be discussed at a panel sponsored by the National Council of Jewish Women, Toronto section, Oct. 4, 7:30 p.m. at Council House.

The forum features Rabbi Reuven Bulka, chair of the Trillium Gift of Life Network, and Rabbi Aaron Flanzreich, spiritual leader of Beth Sholom Synagogue, who will also answer Jewish questions surrounding organ and tissue donation.

Ronda Hecker

Also featured will be the premier showing of Frank Bialystok's video, My Second Bar Mitzvah, filmed 13 years after his liver transplant, and the personal stories of organ donors and recipients.

Ronda Hecker, chair of NCJW's Gift of Life Organ and Tissue Donation Program, said her organization partnered with Trillum about 2-1/2 years ago after she and past president Paula Frisch decided it was an important issue to pursue.

"We want people to realize that saving a life is the biggest mitzvah you can perform, and 'yes you can' donate an organ. This is a project that touches my heart. People do not have to die," Hecker said.

She said that people generally have several common questions about tissue and organ donation. "They want to know if all movements within Judaism agree with it; which parts of their body can be transplanted and whether Judaism requires us to be buried with our bodies intact.

"I always tell them that all movements agree with organ donation, and with regards to be buried intact, that Judaism clearly draws a distinction in the case of donating organs and tissues in order to save a life."

Everyone is a potential organ and tissue donor regardless of age, she said. "Age is less important than the health of the organs and tissues. Even a person with a serious illness can sometimes be an organ or tissue donor. Leave that decision to health professionals."

Hecker said that she knows the topic scares many people, "but we have to make the issue bright and alive. People live because of it. I'm expecting it to be an emotional evening."

Mentorship program helps new grads

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

The TanenbaumCHAT Mentorship Network was slated to hold its first event this week at Scotia Plaza.

The program, which now has 75 mentors and 40 mentees, was set up a couple of years ago to help alumni of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto embarking on or looking ahead to their careers.

Mentor Lauren Friese, 28, who did not attend the school, became involved after she was invited to speak at a TanenbaumCHAT career day.

The founder of Talent Egg, a three-year-old website and career resource for students and new graduates, Friese was mentored herself. "I think it's so important."

She compares mentoring to the feedback that companies get from outside consultants who are objective because they "understand your vision but aren't involved in your day-to-day life."

The relationship she has with her first mentee is "more of an e-mail thing," but they initially met for coffee and "had a great chat."

Lauren Friese

The network has no set guidelines about the amount of obligation a mentor is taking on. "Some are time-specific and some are much more ongoing dialogue," Ben Mogil, chair of the mentorship network, said. "We assume mentees will be proactive and know the balance between being proactive and not being a noodge."

For more information on the program, contact Heather Gutmann at 416-636-5984, ext. 333, or at hgutmann@tanenbaumchat.org.

Cancer survivor, 24, gives back

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

It was a journey he never expected to go on, but one that taught him the importance of giving back.

At just 24 years old, Mark Benmoise of Thornhill, Ont., is a cancer survivor who is committed to raising funds and awareness about the disease, and providing support to those who are also battling cancer.

On Oct. 5, Benmoise will be joining hundreds of Torontonians on the Light the Night Walk run by the Leukemia and Lymphoma Society of Canada, an organization that raises funds for Canadian researchers who focus on leukemia, lymphoma, myeloma and Hodgkin's disease.

Benmoise, a child and youth worker at a non-profit mental health organization called Kinark Child and Family Services, said he became one of the 90,000 Canadians living with, or in remission from blood cancers about five years ago. He said his battle began when he went to visit his girlfriend who lives in New York City.

After getting "really sick, throwing up, spending a lot of time in the bathroom," his doctors chalked it up to food poisoning, but when it happened again, he convinced his doctor to run some tests.

When his ultrasound came back "abnormal," revealing swollen lymph nodes, he was referred to an oncologist.

Over the span of three years, Benmoise underwent a series of CT scans, blood tests and biopsies, but the tests continued to return inconclusive.

He said when he followed up with the oncologist months later, they discovered the lymph nodes in his abdomen had grown even more. His doctor suggested that rather than do another biopsy that may come back inconclusive, he should undergo surgery to completely remove a lymph node so they could come to a definite conclusion.

"At that point, I had been chasing it for three and a half, four years. I thought, let's find out if it's something or nothing."

He soon learned it was something. He was diagnosed with nodular lymphocyte-predominant Hodgkin lymphoma (NLPHL), an uncommon subtype of Hodgkin lymphoma.

"The good news was that it was in the early stages, really treatable, a really good cure rate," Benmoise said.

Earlier this year, after successful rounds of chemotherapy, Benmoise is now in remission. He said what makes his blood cancer different from others is that when another cancer patient is cancer-free for five years, they are considered cured, but NLPHL patients are never considered cured, because it has such a high recurrence rate.

Benmoise, who realizes that although he beat the cancer it will always be a part of his life, said the support he received from his family and friends throughout the process really helped him stay positive.

He said his family and friends often prayed for him at shul and a friend who had made aliyah prayed for him regularly at the Kotel in Jerusalem.

"Now I want to give back. I want to raise money and participate in Light the Night."

Benmoise, who initially only shared his condition with a select group of family and friends, said he didn't decide to go public with his disease until he chose to join the Light the Night walk.

Benmoise created a Facebook page about his goal to raise money for the cause and briefly described his experience fighting cancer.

"I got a lot of responses from people who either had someone connected to them who had Hodgkin lymphoma, or who had Hodgkin lymphoma or another type of blood cancer," he said.

Each walk participant is required to raise a minimum of $250 which will go towards blood cancer research, local programs and support groups and peer-to-peer counseling.

According to the Leukemia & Lymphoma Society of Canada, leukemia remains "the number 1 disease-killer of children under 19 and alarmingly the incidence of non-Hodgkin lymphoma in adults has doubled since 1973."

He said since he announced his goal to raise funds for the walk, he's put together a team of seven people, and together they've raised about $4,000. Benmoise said he hopes his participation in Light the Night will become an annual tradition.

"I want to do this every year. I want to raise money for it, and I'm going to participate in the walk because this is something that is important to me."

But his plans for giving back don't end with the walk. He said he also aspires to volunteer with children at the Hospital for Sick Children in Toronto.

"I've also been looking at attending support groups – not really for me because I feel mentally and physically healthy… I want to offer my positivity to other people and show them the other side of the coin."

Although Johnston's clarification was released less than 24 hours after the initial blog and Facebook posts went up, the story was already making the rounds to Toronto's major newspapers, including the Toronto Star and the National Post.

Grunfeld – who declined to comment to The CJN because she feared she would be misquoted, as she claimed to have been by The Star – released a statement through B'nai Brith Canada saying she stands by her claim that Johnston made an "abhorrent statement" and that "he failed to qualify the statement clearly as an unacceptable opinion held by others."

She said that since she went public with her complaint, "I have since been grossly misquoted and ridiculed by the media, and attempts have been made to assign blame to me with the false claim that I simply 'misheard' or 'half heard' what was said."

Grunfeld added that she was assured by York administrators that Johnston would be encouraged to issue an "unambiguous in-class apology.

"I have not heard even minimal expressions of regret by Prof. Johnston," she wrote.

"I understand that there may have been a miscommunication, but any miscommunication was on the part of the professor, not me. The media has been complicit in allowing a false interpretation of my actions to be circulated widely, which can only have a chilling effect on the ability of students to have any kind of a voice on campus."

Johnston told York's Excalibur student newspaper that he had met with York's dean of social sciences and would not be punished for the statement.

University spokesperson Wallace Pidgeon said York officials met with both Johnston and Grunfeld. He said Johnston's public statements "stand for themselves" and "the university is moving forward and considers the matter closed at this time."

Liknaitzky also feels an apology from Johnston to his students is in order.

"If I were one of the students in the class, I know I would appreciate an apology from the professor to whomever was offended," he said.

"What he said… wasn't the cleverest thing to do, so without providing proper context, I can completely understand why [Grunfeld] would react the way she did."

Commenting on the incident, Eric Lawee, associate director of York's Centre for Jewish Studies, said that "regrettably, the case that certain events of genuine concern to the Jewish community that occurred at York in the past, some of them, but not all of them, blown out of proportion, have predisposed people to rush to judgment about claims of disturbing developments on campus."

He added: "This latest incident serves as a reminder that each case must be judged on its merits, after a full and careful investigation. In this case, the Jewish community did this successfully, helping to clarify and calm the situation."

Fogel said that "bitter experience" has made the community sensitive to campus issues. "In that regard, I think the heightened sensitivity is absolutely justified, and we would be negligent in our responsibility if we didn't approach it like that."

But, he reiterated, one must be certain that a charge of antisemitism is legitimate before lodging a complaint.

"I wish that… instead of leaving the classroom, which is what [Grunfeld] did by her own admission, she had stayed. Even if she had not heard his context and explanation, which apparently came right after he had expressed the statement, she could have at the very least challenged him on it."

But Fogel also sympathized with Grunfeld.

"It's an issue of having lived on a campus for three years where there have been endless examples of antisemitic, anti-Israel vitriol, students being intimidated, professors who have been less than supportive. So I understand the sensitivity that she comes into the situation with. I certainly don't judge her or criticize her for having that uppermost in her mind."

B'nai Brith president Frank Dimant took his defence of Grunfeld a step further when he told the National Post that Grunfeld "felt marginalized and targeted by the way subject matter relating to odious opinions was presented."

York, Al-Quds sign academic deal

Mamdouh Shoukri

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

York University and Al-Quds University in Jerusalem signed an academic agreement earlier this year at a ceremony held on York's Keele campus.

"We are excited about this agreement and welcome the opportunity to strengthen our relationship with Al-Quds University," York president and vice-chancellor Mamdouh Shoukri said in a statement.

"York recognizes the value that these agreements have in enhancing the teaching, research and educational experience for faculty and students."

The agreement with Al-Quds involved the signing of a student exchange protocol and a commitment to collaborate in establishing a public policy and administration program, including a school of public policy and administration at Al-Quds.

York also boasts a number of scholarships, partnerships and exchange programs with Israeli universities, including Hebrew University, Tel Aviv University and Bar-Ilan University.

According to York's Centre for Jewish Studies director Sara Horowitz, York is also working to establish ties with the University of Haifa.

"Regarding Al-Quds, I think ties with western institutions, fostering education, is in everyone's best interest," Horowitz wrote in an e-mail from Jerusalem.

Brandeis University administrators must have felt the same way when the school partnered with Al-Quds in 1998.

In 2005, after a decision by Britain's Association of University Teachers (AUT) to boycott Israeli universities, Hebrew U also signed an agreement with Al-Quds.

Bilingual program honours Richler

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Of all the ideas that were tossed around to commemorate the 10th anniversary of Mordecai Richler's death, McGill University's to create a program that would encourage collaboration between English and French seemed the least likely to succeed.

Louis Hamelin

But, the McGill Mordecai Richler Writer-in-Residence Program has been launched, while it will be another year before the City of Montreal's project to renovate and rename the gazebo on the slope of Mount Royal after him is completed.

Two distinguished Canadian writers, one francophone and one anglophone, have been appointed as the first residents. Louis Hamelin's first novel, Le Rage, won a Governor General's Award in 1989, and his latest, Le Constellation du Lynx, about the 1970 October Crisis, is this year's winner of the Prix des libraires du Québec.

Kathleen Winter

He is also a regular contributor to Le Devoir, a newspaper that Richler attacked for its antisemitism in the 1930s, and which criticized him decades later for perceived prejudice against French Quebec.

Hamelin's anglophone counterpart is Kathleen Winter, whose 2010 novel, Annabel, was a finalist for the Giller Prize, Governor General's Award and other citations. Formerly of Newfoundland, she now lives in Montreal.

Kwinter facing tough challenge

Ron Csillag
Special to The CJN

Monte Kwinter doesn't mind being called a warhorse. In fact, one of the first things he points out is that he's the second-longest serving MPP in Ontario's legislature (after fellow Liberal Jim Bradley), and, if re-elected, he'll surpass the previous record of the oldest one (81; Kwinter is now 80).

Ontario Votes
York Centre

He's been at Queen's Park since 1985, he also notes, and this is his eighth election. And he stresses that at no time did anyone discourage him from seeking another term.

"I'm still going strong," he said.

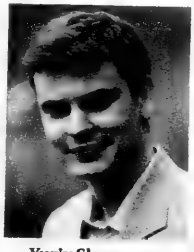
Long a visible presence in the Jewish and political arenas, Kwinter is again the Liberal candidate in York Centre. In the 2007 provincial vote, he polled 16,648 votes to his Conservative rival's 11,023. But Kwinter's support fell by nearly 11 per cent over the previous election, while the Tories went up seven per cent.

Monte Kwinter

Kwinter now faces Progressive Conservative Michael Mostyn, who has run in two federal elections; NDP hopeful John Fagan; Green Party candidate Yuriy Shevyryov; and Libertarian David Epstein.

Michael Mostyn

York Centre runs north-south from Highway 401 to Steeles Avenue. Its approximate eastern boundary begins at Yonge Street in the north, then cuts west north of Finch Avenue to Bathurst Street, where it continues to the west branch of the Don River. The western edge begins at Keele Street in the north, then follows Grandravine Drive to Black Creek, down to Sheppard Avenue, where it cuts west and then south down Jane Street.



Yuriy Shevyryov

It has one of Ontario's highest proportions of Jewish residents, at 24 per cent. There's a strong concentration of Jewish voters along the traditional Bathurst Street corridor, many of them immigrants from former Soviet republics.

Over the years, Kwinter has served in cabinet in four different ministries. Most recently, he was parliamentary assistant to the minister of economic development and trade.

Kwinter notes that Premier Dalton McGuinty has developed deep ties to Israel, with scientific and trade deals cemented last year with a visit by the premier. But Kwinter also concedes that the "Stephen Harper effect" may help Ontario's Conservatives among Jewish voters.

The MPP cited a recent Toronto Star/Angus Reid poll that showed Ontarians' main concerns in this election are the economy (27 per cent of respondents), health care (20 per cent), government spending (12 per cent) and tax relief (eight per cent).

With senior citizens comprising about 40 percent of York Centre's residents, "I would say that health care is the number 1 issue in the riding."

The Liberals have delivered in that area, and in others, he said, ticking off several accomplishments: the recovery of 125 per cent of jobs lost in the economic downturn, the best record in Canada; the best schools in the English speaking world (according to one study); and having gone from the longest surgical wait times in the country to the shortest.

Asked whether all that was done by increasing government spending by 70 per cent over the last eight years, as the Tories allege, Kwinter said, "I don't know if that's the number."

But, "there's no question we've increased spending," he said, perking up. "I don't know the number. But the whole point is that we've increased spending to provide services that people have been demanding. [The Conservatives] can yell all they like. I have found over the years that people don't mind paying taxes as long as they get something for it. What they don't like is money that's spent that they get no benefit from or they think is misspent."

Future Liberal promises include 50,000 new jobs in clean energy; 30 per cent off the cost of college and university tuition; a 10 per cent cut in electricity bills, and 250,000 children in full-time kindergarten by 2014 (and in York Centre, the opening of Humber River Regional Hospital).

PC Party says Liberals will bankrupt province

As far as Mostyn and the Conservatives are concerned, the Liberals are on track to bankrupt the province. They charge that since McGuinty took office in 2003, Ontario's debt has ballooned by 73 per cent, to $257 billion, despite bringing in the so-called health tax and the HST.

A 37-year-old lawyer, Mostyn's previous job was as director of government relations for B'nai Brith Canada. He ran for the federal Conservatives in York Centre in 2004 and 2006, losing both times to Liberal Ken Dryden, but boosting support for the Tories to 30 per cent in the riding.

Mostyn said he's knocked on some 15,000 doors in the riding since the last federal vote, and has found that "overwhelmingly" the main issue is cost of living.

The higher-than-average proportion of seniors on fixed incomes and possibly the highest concentration of Holocaust survivors in the country have seen their hydro bills rise by between 84 and 150 per cent.

"People can't breathe," Mostyn said. "It's the overall tax burden. They feel squeezed by government and they're looking for relief – both seniors and young families."

Mostyn points to the Tories' platform, contained in their "Changebook," which calls for "reinvestment" in health care to reach $6.1 billion by the fourth year, and $2.5 billion pumped into education.

Outside those two areas, "we are going to be looking for savings [calculated at] two cents on the dollar." Between McGuinty's "sneaky" eco-tax, the health tax, and the $1 billion e-Health "boondoggle," Mostyn said "people see the waste in government, and it's not hard for [them] to imagine that there are several areas that can be cut."

Running for the Green Party is Yuriy Shevyryov, who was born and raised in Kazakhstan and came to Canada in 2004. His platform consists mainly of promoting physical wellness to reduce health care costs and lowering energy costs through greater efficiency and green initiatives.

John Fagan

In York Centre, the provincial Green Party received 2,206 votes in 2007, up from 1,496 in the 2003 election.

The CJN was unable to interview the NDP candidate, Fagan, who returned calls after the paper's deadline.

Fagan, resident of York Centre for more than 30 years, is a lawyer and workers' rights advocate. His law degree is from the University of Toronto and he has been a lawyer in Ontario since 1975. About half his legal career has been in the private sector and about half with the Ontario government.

In the last provincial election, the NDP received 11 per cent of votes in the riding.

Fagan ran in York Centre's predecessor riding, Wilson Heights, in the 1990 election, and received 6,618 votes, or 26.8 per cent of ballots cast.

Liberal, PC heavyweights do battle

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Come Oct. 6, voters in the riding with perhaps the largest proportion of Jews in Canada will have to decide which prominent Jewish candidate they want to represent them at Queen's Park.

Ontario Votes
Thornhill

In what's shaping up to be one of the closest races of interest to the Jewish community, Conservative incumbent Peter Shurman is facing Liberal challenger Bernie Farber in Thornhill.

Both come from high-profile, public backgrounds – Shurman was an outspoken radio personality on Toronto's CFRB 1010 from 2004 to 2007, while Farber was the CEO and public voice of Canadian Jewish Congress from 2005 to earlier this year – and both have large followings.

The NDP and Green party are also fielding candidates in the riding – Cindy Hackelberg and Steff Duncan, respectively.

Thornhill comprises portions of Vaughan and Markham and runs geographically east of Highway 400, south of Rutherford Road and a portion of Highway 7, west of Highway 404 and north of Steeles Avenue.

In interviews with The CJN last week, both Shurman and Farber discussed their views on community security, health, Israel, faith-based education and transportation.

Hackelberg and Duncan were unable to be interviewed before deadline.

Speaking about what they've been hearing while canvassing the riding, Shurman and Farber both spoke about how traffic gridlock in Thornhill is a major issue, as is the health of the economy.

"People in Thornhill are having the same problems with their hydro bills, like everywhere else in the province," Shurman said. "We will relieve the tax burden... by taking the provincial portion of the HST off electricity and heating bills."

Farber said he's been hearing about health, transit, jobs and security issues while canvassing.

Of particular interest to him is the impending construction of the new Vaughan Hospital, to be built across from Canada's Wonderland, as promised by the McGuinty government.

Bernie Farber

"Waiting times [for surgery] are coming down in the province. Is it perfect? No. But it's getting better," Farber said.

A new hospital in the riding would help increase continuity of care for patients there, he added.

Farber said there's no guarantee a Conservative government would build the new hospital.

Peter Shurman

On the question of provincial trade with Israel, both candidates claimed their parties are best equipped to expand economic ties with the Jewish state.

Shurman accused McGuinty of opportunism when it came to the Liberal's increased business dealings with Israel.

McGuinty went on a Liberal economic mission to Israel in 2010 and refused Shurman's request at the time to accompany the mission, even though he said he'd pay his own way.

"Dalton McGuinty used Israel as an opportunity. That's the way McGuinty uses everything. He saw Jewish voters, so he went to Israel. The fact is, Israel represents no more and no less to Dalton McGuinty than any other country. But to me and the people of Thornhill, it represents a great deal," he said.

"It is Conservative party platform... to continue to support Israel unequivocally. As a government, we will improve and increase trade with Israel and make sure this is front and centre."

Farber insists the Liberals, with his input, will continue to create jobs in Ontario and Israel through his party's Middle East policies.

He defended the premier, saying McGuinty "gets it" when it comes to Israel.

"He's spoken out about how he has more work to do on trade with Israel. He wants to expand it. And I have good connections with the Jewish community and the State of Israel, plus a constituent base that wants to see these good things expand," Farber said. "If elected, I will use whatever advocacy skills I have, whatever connections I have, to work with the premier, who sees Israel as a huge and important trading partner with Ontario."

Farber added that various pending contracts between Ontario and Israeli venture capital firms could all be wiped out if the Tories take power.

"No matter what my opponent may tell you, continuing with existing [Liberal-brokered memorandums of understanding] between Israel and Ontario is not in the Conservative platform. These will come under the Tory chopping block."

As for security for communities at risk of hate crimes, specifically antisemitism, both Farber and Shurman said they would work hard to address this issue.

Shurman said his party would do "anything it has to" to stamp out antisemitism.

Fighting hate high on candidates' agendas

"We've seen antisemitic incidents increase. From a provincial perspective, we can be attuned to what's happening on college campuses. We can also take a look at what and who [the province] is funding," he said. "Specifically an event like Pride. Any group that uses public funds should be held to high account for what goes on in that event. That includes fines and being able to recoup the money for the event."

Shurman noted that he put forward a private member's bill in 2009 condemning the Israeli apartheid week on campuses. The bill received all-party support.

Farber noted that in his prior capacity with Congress, he was often in direct contact with police forces around the province to help combat antisemitism. He cited York Regional Police as a "leader" in fighting hate crimes.

But as the Liberal candidate in Thornhill, he's reminding voters that the Liberal government recently gave $400,000 to the Hate Crime Extremism Investigative Team, a province-wide police unit that helps to protect at-risk communities.

"This enables police forces to better resource tools to fight hate crimes. It's something I know about," he said.

When asked to speak about faith-based education funding – the topic that dominated the 2007 provincial election, and which the Conservatives, under then-leader John Tory, used as their main campaign plank, costing them the election – Farber and Shurman had differing views.

According to Shurman, the idea of helping different cultural communities defray the costs of sending their children to parochial schools, similar to how the province funds the Catholic school system, was simply "not on the radar."

"The pronouncement on that policy was made loud and clear by the electorate in Ontario. Our party paid dearly for it [and] it's not something that people in Ontario want. They have made their voice heard," he said.

Farber took a more nuanced position.

He said he's had this issue raised to him by constituents, and he tells them all it's an issue he will definitely work on, when the time is right.

While CEO of Congress, Farber was outspoken about the need for funding equality for Jewish and other faith-based communities.

"My values haven't changed," he said. "I've spoken out on this issue for the past 22 years. But the truth of the matter is, right here and now, this is not an issue in this campaign. Not one party wants to or is talking about this, for better or for worse."

However, Farber said, "somewhere down the line" the province will have to "find a way to address this issue, not just for Jews, but for everybody."

Thinking good thoughts about thoughts

Thoughts are powerful things. Hundreds of books have been written about how the power of a single thought can change your life and that what you think is often what you attract into your life.

So if you think good and positive thoughts, more positivity often becomes available to you. Thoughts really do shape your life, and in the book The Power of a Single Thought: How to Initiate Major Life Changes from the Quiet of Your Mind, Gay Hendricks and Debbie De Voe tell readers how to change themselves with a single thought. "You can turn your thoughts into weapons that you use to destroy yourself, or you can turn your thoughts into tools to build joy, strength and peace in your life. By consciously choosing to think positively, you live divinely."

Life Coach Corner

Judy Siblin-Librach

The theme of a new children's book, Thinking About Thoughts, by Leanne Matlow is "you are what you think." In a way that children can understand, Matlow tackles everything from all or nothing thinking to learning how to think more hopefully and how to be your own best cheerleader.

Matlow writes: "Now your brain will listen, when you say, 'Yes I can! I've done this before, so I'll do it again.' So put good thoughts in your head. You will do more, feel glad and your brain will forget all the bad thoughts it had."

The character in Thinking About Thoughts finally achieves success by using better strategies to manage his thoughts and learns to change his thinking. This is a fantastic book to help younger children learn how to think in a more positive way. It creates an opportunity for discussion with a child who might not feel as strong as he or she could be. Through this book and discussions, children will discover how incredibly empowered and strong they can become.

How can we all change our thinking from negative and self-limiting to positive and empowering? As Henricks and Devoe write, "If you've been saying, 'I'm afraid of public speaking,' make up a sentence like 'I enjoy speaking in public.' If that feels like too much of a jump, you could say, 'I'd like to learn how to enjoy speaking in public.' The exact sentence you use is up to you, just as long as it has positive quality. Gradually, with time and practice, your thoughts naturally begin to gravitate in a more empowering and positive direction."

Calming the mind is an important part of thinking more positively about things that might feel scary, overwhelming or impossible. In The Power of a Single Thought, there is a wonderful exercise called "a seven-minute calming and manifestation process," in which you learn to calm the mind through a series of one-minute exercises.

Say the authors, "A calm mind is one of the beautiful jewels of wisdom. It results from the patient and long exertion of self-control, and its materialization reflects great experience and deep understanding of the laws and operations of thought. People gain serenity in direct proportion to their acceptance of the fact that they're the result of their thoughts. A calm mind also necessitates the recognition that other people are the result of their thoughts. Knowing this, you can stop fussing, fuming, worrying and grieving, and instead you remain poised, steadfast and serene."

Ultimately, as the authors point out, self-control brings you strength and calmness is power. Try to say the word "peace" or "shalom" to quiet your mind and enjoy being in a place of serenity and calm.

Israel, Canada discuss deepening trade ties

Canadian and Israeli officials met in Ottawa early last week to discuss how best to strengthen economic ties between the two countries.

Canada's minister of international trade and minister for the Asia-Pacific gateway, Ed Fast, spoke with Shalom Simhon, Israel's minister of industry, trade and labor and minister of minority affairs, to discuss ways to expand free trade.

No details were made public, although a spokesperson for the newly installed head of Israel's economic mission to Canada, Ran Yehezkel, who was in attendance, said the discussion between Fast and Simhon was "very technical."

The Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement (CIFTA) came into force in 1997. Since then, two-way merchandise trade between the countries has more than doubled, reaching $1.4 billion in 2010, making Israel Canada's sixth-largest merchandise export market in the Middle East.

CIFTA eliminated tariffs on all industrial products manufactured in Canada and Israel, as well as a limited number of agricultural and fisheries products.

In 2010, then-minister of international trade, Peter Van Loan, together with then-Israeli trade minister Binyamin Ben-Eliezer, jointly announced that Canada and Israel would begin taking steps to update CIFTA.

According to Canada's Ministry of International Trade website, Israeli and Canadian officials were scheduled to "start exploratory talks in order to work on moving beyond the original, first-generation trade agreement that is currently in place by significantly expanding its application."

Hamas is running Gaza schools: Bedein

And in reply to a Bedein film that accused UNRWA of promoting the right of return, UNRWA stated: "We furthermore note that no actual evidence has been produced to show that 'right of return' activities have taken place in any UNRWA facilities, for which the agency is responsible or that UNRWA is a part of 'the international right of return campaign.' If actual evidence is produced, UNRWA will examine the evidence and react as appropriate. UNRWA has publicly rejected any accusations made by Bedein in the past..."

Last year, UNRWA issued a statement in response to other Bedein critiques in the film, For the Sake of the Naqba: "The film states that UNRWA schools 'adhere to a curriculum that inculcates anti-Israel teachings at every level' and quotes a 12th grade textbook. In fact, UNRWA does not teach 12th grade, and this is not a UNRWA textbook. UNRWA uses the Palestinian Authority curriculum, which a 2003 independent report commissioned by the United States concluded is 'peaceful,' and one in which 'religious and political tolerance is emphasized.'"

Groiss said his research shows that a theme in Palestinian texts is that "Jews have no historical past or current presence in the country; they have no holy places in the country; and that the Tomb of Rachel, the Cave of the Patriarchs and the Wailing Wall are Muslim holy places."

"The books never mention a peaceful resolution of the conflict, but liberation and struggle." There are many references to jihad and sacrifice, and the books refer to both the State of Israel and the Palestinian-governed areas as "occupied territories." The presence of 5.5 million Jews in Israel is ignored, he added.

Pointing to Hamas control of the Gaza teachers union and to the large number of Hamas members employed by UNRWA, Bedein said: "Hamas is running the schools, which are becoming more Islamic and radical, and UNRWA is co-operating with Hamas."

Western countries press for changes in UNRWA schools, he continued. Thirty-eight mostly western nations contribute the vast majority of UNRWA's annual budget, which is close to $1 billion. Canada provided the UN agency with more than $11 million in 2010 for use in the West Bank and Gaza, he noted.

Western governments could also urge UNRWA or help resettle Palestinian refugees, as UNHCR has done in the case of Iraqi Palestinians who have started new lives in Chile and other states, he said.

Erdogan's belligerence is a growing worry

Last week, Canadian media gave substantial attention to Turkish Prime Minister Recep Erdogan's trip to Cairo, the first stop on a three-capital swing through "Arab Spring" countries.

The visit followed two major negative events from Israel's perspective. First, there was the expulsion of Israel's senior embassy staff from Ankara – Erdogan's latest retribution over Israel's refusal to apologize for the deaths of eight Turkish activists aboard the Mavi Mamara, and his rejection of the Palmer Report, which largely supported Israel's case in intercepting the Gaza flotilla. That was followed a short time later by the violent assault on Israel's embassy in Cairo, causing 80 embassy staff to be evacuated to safety in Jerusalem.

The Calgary Herald published a McClatchy Newspapers story on Erdogan's visit to the Egyptian capital. It opened forcefully about the implications for the Jewish state: "Israel's increasing isolation in a changing Middle East became clear Tuesday when the prime minister of Turkey, once one of the Jewish state's most dependable allies, kicked off a state visit here with a series of fiery speeches in which he branded Israel a criminal and demanded UN recognition for a Palestinian state."

On the issue of the broader implication of Erdogan's trip to the most populous Arab country, Derek Stoffel, the CBC's Middle East correspondent, cited a comment on World Report from Bertrand Badie of the Centre for International Studies and Research in Paris: "Turkey is probably trying to take benefit from the political vacuum in the Arab world. That's to say we are now clearly watching the birth of a regional power." Badie's evaluation contrasts with what Turkey's ambassador to Canada told the Globe and Mail, when he insisted that Turkey is not "changing its axis" by moving away from the West and secular democracy, or by seeking regional supremacy. Others are far from assured on all these counts.

For instance, in a strong editorial comment, the Winnipeg Free Press criticized Erdogan for inflaming tensions in the region, in particular against Israel. It also called into question Erdogan's stated commitment to secular democracy (a secularism traditionally safeguarded by the army, which has now come under Erdogan's "civilian" control): "Mr. Erdogan has been prime minister of Turkey for more than eight years. In that time he has done more than any other leader to undo the legacy of secular democracy and the promise of western-style freedom promised by Kemal Ataturk when he established a modern Turkey almost 100 years ago.

"In Turkey today, the fundamentalists are coming home to roost, the government of Mr. Erdogan is looking to the Arab world to re-establish itself as a regional power and Israel – and its western allies – must now tally the cost of the unnecessary loss of a pivotal Eurasian ally."

The Vancouver Sun's Jonathan Manthorpe drew attention to a Pew Research Center poll conducted this spring that "found that 79 per cent of Egyptians, 72 per cent of Jordanians and 64 per cent of Lebanese have confidence in Erdogan as a regional leader." Manthorpe added: "The Arab embracing of Erdogan comes almost a century after the Arab Revolt demolished the Turkish Ottoman Empire that had ruled the Middle East for centuries."

But not all Arabs embrace Erdogan's leadership. It's Turkey's ambition to be a new regional power and a challenge to Shiite Iran's influence in the overwhelmingly Sunni Arab Middle East that has many Arabs, who remember their history and 400 hundred years of Ottoman rule, concerned about such a revival. They reacted negatively, for instance, to statements that Turkey's foreign minister, Ahmed Davutoglu, made in talks with Bosnian leaders in Sarajevo in October 2009 when, recalling Turkish rule there, he called for a rebirth of the Ottoman Empire.

And Israelis, to say the least, are concerned about Erdogan's demagoguery, his embrace of Hamas and his mounting threats.

Rare Auschwitz uniform donated to Holocaust centre

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — On her 97th birthday this Sept. 26, Imy (Irma) Nemenoff-Gellert will donate the jacket she was forced to wear in Auschwitz to the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre (MHMC).

Giving this article to the MHMC was an emotional decision for her family, as it is the only material remnant of her internment during World War II.

"They decided to donate the jacket to the museum so that it stays in Montreal, where Imy made her home and spent most of her postwar life," said MHMC spokesperson Audrey Licop.

"It is important to them that it be preserved in the right conservation conditions, along with its history, and that it be made available to people outside their family."

Nemenoff-Gellert commented ironically: "I was decorated with this jacket when I arrived in Auschwitz, not right away but after a few days. The jacket had the number '609 U' with 'U' for 'Ungar–Hungarian' in German."

Born in Lugoj, Romania, she was deported to Auschwitz II-Birkenau in Poland and her husband was killed in Auschwitz. She cleaned latrines and was also forced to dig holes in the ground for no apparent reason.

Toward the end of the war, she was sent to the Mauthausen concentration camp in Austria, where she was liberated by the U.S. armed forces. Afterward, Nemenoff-Gellert worked for the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration doing clerical work and translation.

The uniform jacket Imy (Irma) Nemenoff-Gellert was forced to wear at Auschwitz.

She immigrated to Canada in 1946 under a program to bring in domestics and became a maid in Toronto.

Julie Guinard, MHMC museum co-ordinator, explained the significance of this donation: "A very small number of prisoners kept their uniforms after liberation, and even fewer brought them to their new country of residence, and so few still have one.

"This jacket is also a meaningful artifact about the deportation of Hungarian Jews to Auschwitz-Birkenau."

The MHMC collection includes only three uniforms of concentration camp prisoners: a dress worn by a woman in four different camps in Poland, a jacket worn by a man in Auschwitz, and another worn in Dachau.

Nemenoff-Gellert's jacket is the first worn by a woman in Auschwitz-Birkenau to enter the collection.

The MHMC continues to look for artifacts and photographs on life before, during and immediately after the Holocaust, or related to antisemitism in the past. People who have objects related to the Holocaust and who wish to ensure their long-term preservation and their use for educational purposes are encouraged to meet with Guinard to discuss the donation of such objects.

The museum collection, the largest in Canada, encompasses more than 7,500 objects, documents and photographs related to the history of the Holocaust, as well as 480 survivor testimonies filmed for the Witness-to-History program.

Most items were donations by survivors who immigrated to Montreal, or their families.

The collection is intended for research and educational purposes, and is used throughout the museum's permanent exhibition and in pedagogical tools.

Montreal chassidic school remains open for now

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A 60-year-old chassidic school has been given a reprieve from closure after a court refused to grant a provisional injunction sought by the Quebec government.

Quebec Superior Court Judge Gérard Dugré earlier this month ruled in favour of the Toras Moshe Academy in Mile End, an elementary-level yeshiva run by the Satmar community. It has 163 students.

Dugré recommended that the parties submit the case for trial.

The attorney general on behalf of the Ministry of Education went to court in June 2010 to have the school shut down because it is not abiding by the law. The case was heard over three days last October.

The recourse to legal action came after some three years of talks between the school and then-education minister Michelle Courchesne failed to reach an agreement on how the school could respect the province's mandatory curriculum.

The government wanted to have the school closed temporarily while it pursued through the courts its case for permanent closure.

It found that the school was not sufficiently teaching secular studies, that teachers are unlicensed and that the school is operating without a permit. The school has never sought and does not receive funding from the government.

The school says it will not alter its traditional emphasis on religious studies and the community is acting within its charter rights.

Its lawyer, Jean Lemoine, argued that "religious instruction is central to their convictions and religious practices... and that freedom of religion would be infringed upon if [the school] was obliged to conform to the régime pédagogique."

He said the Education Act allows for certain exemptions for non-profit religious institutions. Some talmudic studies might be deemed equivalent to certain secular subjects, for example.

Dugré said the matter "raises important and delicate questions, legal as well as social. The education of a hundred children is at the heart of the debate."

The attorney general had not, at time of writing, said whether it will appeal.

Toras Moshe students receive some instruction in French, English and math, but not at the level required, and a little geography and history, but no science, except that which can be derived from the Talmud. The school does not teach the ethics and religious culture program introduced three years ago.

Government lawyer Eric Dufour told the court the boys were receiving 35 hours a week of religious instruction and only six hours of secular studies.

The ministry's minimum for compulsory subjects is 18 hours, whether the school is public or private, subsidized or not. None of the six teachers of secular subjects was licensed.

Dugré is, incidentally, the judge who last year made the landmark decision exempting the private Catholic Loyola High School from the ethics and religious culture course, upholding its right to continue its own approach to the subject.

Toras Moshe director David Meisels stressed that, for haredi Jews, the traditional way their children are educated cannot be compromised.

"Complementary secular education must be in conformity with the principles of our religion... It cannot detract from religious studies," he wrote in an affidavit.

The case of another chassidic school that refuses to teach the prescribed curriculum, the Rabbinical College in Boisbriand, under the auspices of the Tosher community, has also been referred to the attorney general by the education ministry.

Five other chassidic or Orthodox schools, which the government found were not adhering to the law either, reached an understanding with the ministry to regularize their situation by 2012-2013.

The ministry amended the Education Act last year to allow all schools in the province the flexibility to meet the minimum number of school days by extending class time into weekends and the summer. It was widely perceived that this was done to allow the Jewish schools to teach all of the secular curriculum without having to cut back on their religious studies.

The Satmar community no longer has a boys high school in Montreal. Most of those leaving Toras Moshe continue their studies in New York or Israel, Alex Werzberger, a Satmar community leader, said.

UN gambit may doom PA leaders, Dershowitz says

MONTREAL — Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and Prime Minister Salam Fayyad may have written their political obituaries with their bid for a unilateral declaration of independence, says Harvard University law professor and celebrity criminal lawyer Alan Dershowitz.

Speaking before about 1,000 people at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim Sept. 15, Dershowitz said the two leaders have created high expectations among their people of immediate, full statehood that likely cannot be fulfilled.

Key south Winnipeg riding home to many Jews

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Manitobans are going to the polls Oct. 4 and River Heights, the Winnipeg riding with a large Jewish population, could be a bellwether.

For the past 12 years, River Heights has been represented by Manitoba Liberal Leader Jon Gerrard. The Liberals have been Manitoba's third party since the NDP won its first majority in 1969 (except for the 1988 election, when the Liberals finished second). During Gerrard's tenure as leader, the Liberals have has never elected more than two MLAs (including Gerrard). Two of his three predecessors as Liberal leader also represented River Heights, attesting to the traditional Liberal bent of many Jewish voters.

Jon Gerrard

This time, though, with the governing NDP – under a new leader – in a neck-and-neck race with the Conservative opposition and the Liberals polling in single digits, if River Heights PC candidate Marty Morantz is able to unseat Gerrard, it could herald the Conservatives returning to power for the first time since 1999.

Morantz, a Jewish Winnipeg lawyer in his late 40s, has been a lifelong Conservative supporter and activist. He has been involved in provincial Tory campaigns for 35 years, although this is his first as a candidate.

He said he has knocked on "thousands of doors" and is finding "substantial dissatisfaction" with the current government "as well as a desire on the part of constituents to be represented by an MLA who is sitting on the government side of the legislature."

There are six other Winnipeg ridings with significant numbers of Jewish voters, but those seats aren't thought to be in play.

Tuxedo, which adjoins River Heights, is one of the wealthiest residential areas in the city and almost always votes Conservative. Current PC MLA Heather Stefanson is a lock to retain the riding.

Fort Whyte, which includes the relatively new upscale Lindenwoods area just east of River Heights and is home to a growing number of young Jewish families, is represented by Conservative Leader Hugh McFadyen.

Hugh McFadyen

In north Winnipeg, Dave Chomiak, the NDP MLA for Kildonan and a longtime cabinet minister, should have no trouble being re-elected in the traditionally NDP area.

Also, it's quite likely the NDP will hold the inner city ridings of Fort Rouge, home to a number of Jewish seniors living in high-end apartments and condos, and Wolseley, a mixed-income area, while the Conservatives will probably hold Charleswood, a more affordable neighbourhood just south of Tuxedo that is attracting Jewish immigrants.

Both the current NDP government led by Premier Greg Selinger (and former premier Gary Doer before him) and the PC government in the 1990s, led by Gary Filmon, have had a close and warm relationship with the Jewish community.

In recent years, through the efforts of former Winnipeg Jewish National Fund shaliach Rami Kleinmann, the NDP government has signed several joint agreements with the JNF and other Israeli partners in the fields of greenhouse construction on northern Manitoba aboriginal communities, as well as water research and birding.

Under Filmon, the province facilitated the construction of a Holocaust memorial on the grounds of the legislature. The memorial has become the centrepiece of Holocaust commemorations in Winnipeg.

Both Filmon and Doer have been honoured by the Jewish community.

While all three parties are making similar promises about more funding for health care, education and crime prevention, the major difference of opinion between the NDP and the Conservatives is over the location of a new hydro line bringing electricity from northern to southern Manitoba.

The NDP is insisting that the line be built along the west side of Lake Winnipeg – at an additional cost of more than $500 million – rather than the less expensive option on the as-yet-undeveloped east side of the lake. The Conservatives would build on the east side.

Rivers opens UJA Ottawa launch

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Laughter is the best medicine. We've all heard it said and many of us have experienced the therapeutic effects of a good belly laugh.

Joan Rivers has experienced the effect from both sides, as humour has helped her deal with her own personal life crises, and she, in turn, has helped millions of people laugh their troubles away.

On Sept. 12, Rivers shared her story and a few laughs with an audience at the National Arts Centre at the Jewish Federation of Ottawa's 2012 UJA Campaign Kickoff.

Well known for her acerbic wit, foul language and dedication to plastic surgery, Rivers is an inveterate survivor – both of life's vagaries and the fickleness of show business. One would never guess from her photos, or even from seeing her in person, and especially from her vocabulary, that Rivers is nearly an octogenarian.

Joan Rivers

She has been up and she has been down, but she is riding a career high now and her warm reception in Ottawa was a testament to her ability to engage a crowd.

"Life goes in circles and we should always remember this in hard times," said Rivers as she told her life story, which included her career rise and her sudden plummet to the depths of despair when her husband, Edgar, committed suicide, leaving her deeply in debt, unable to get work, and estranged from her only daughter, who held her responsible for the tragedy.

She climbed back up, very slowly and with great difficulty, by sheer willpower and determination. Using the stories of her parents and parents-in-law, who were all hard-working Jewish immigrants, Rivers illustrated that resilience conquers all.

"We should be victors, not victims," she said.

She has no patience for people who whine about trivial things and fail to appreciate what's good in life.

"You're all sitting here, you're all wearing shoes, you have indoor toilets, and you probably drove here, so shut up!" she said.

She urged people to enjoy the good times. "I am so sick of people that don't know when it's a good time."

The evening was chaired by brothers Jeff, Stephen and Michael Polowin, all of whom are actively involved in Ottawa's Jewish community.

Following a video about what the campaign funds are used for, representatives of various segments of the community spoke about their involvement with the community and how the federation has affected their lives. Campaign chair Michael Landau, women's campaign chair Susan Viner-Vered, thanked everyone for attending and urged them to "live generously. It does a world of good."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

גידי קורן וחברים

שירלי שגב- בית כנסת בסגנון אחר

"שלום גידי,קראתי כמו תמיד את הכתבה שלך, בה תיארת את התפילות לחגים המאורגנות על ידי משה רונן , אחיו ואביו, ועל האוירה שלהם שמתאימה לישראלים. אז חשבתי שאני חייבת לכתוב לך על בית הכנסת שלי, קהילת "דרכי נועם", שנמצאת ב-864 שפרד, ליד וילמינגטון, שבו תמצא את אותה אוירה בכל ימות השנה. נראה שאצל הישראלים אנחנו אחד הסודות השמורים של טורונטו ולא יודעים עלינו. שני דברים נראים לי הכי חשובים: ראשית, העברית היא עיקר בשבת, וזה נותן הרגשה של בית, באוירה של פשטות, פתיחות וחמימות. שנית, הדינמיקה של המקום: משפחות עם ילדים, גיל העמידה, זוגות צעירים, נוער, עם פעילות עניפה של תרבות יהודית , ישראלית וכללית. אנחנו מעט ישראלים ואני לא יודעת למה, כי אוהבים ומכבדים אותנו. לרבים בקהילה יש בישראל ילדים, הורים ומשפחה והקשר עם ישראל הדוק. בכל אופן אין זכר לניכור שלפעמים שומעים שיש בין הקהילה היהודית המקומית והישראלים. בשבילי, שבאתי לטורונטו בדיוק לפני 30 שנה- "דרכי נועם" היא הבית שלי, המשפחה שלי בטורונטו, המקום שאליו התמזל מזלי להיכנס, אז לפני 30 שנה, ומישהו בדלת שאל לשמי. אמרתי "שירלי שגב", והוא אמר "ברוכה הבאה, אפשר להציע לך עליה לתורה, הרי את יודעת עברית, אז לא תהיה לך בעיה". מאז גדלנו לקהילה גדולה ואנחנו ידועים בעיר, וגם הבניין החדש והיפהפה שלנו תורם לרוח המקום. אני מזמינה את כל הישראלים לבוא אלינו, אם בשבת לתפילה, אם לפעילויות הרבות ואם סתם לבקר. שירלי שגב, 416-570-7409".

"הערת שוליים"- שיא חדש לסרט ישראלי

חפשו אותו בארץ, או כאן לכשיגיע. הוא הוצג בפסטיבל הסרטים של טורונטו בשבוע שעבר.

עשר בסולם קורן.

CENTRE FOR DYNAMIC LEARNING LAUNCHES FALL 2011

As a ZOOMER, you ask yourself how do I stay stimulated, challenged, engaged, social and integral. LOOK NO FURTHER.

The Prosserman JCC debuts its innovative CENTRE FOR DYNAMIC LEARNING (CDL). This initiative started by people who asked these same questions and shaped CDL ; created to develop and offer 45+ zoomers, JCC members and non-members alike, volunteer opportunities and learning environment that engage and stimulate. The CDL Organizing Committee was formed and designed to include a diverse group of individuals who have brought their own experiences and expertise to the table and helped build learning programs for their peers.

Through their efforts, we are proudly able to present this interactive approach to adult learning, leadership and personal growth, encouraging everyone to challenge themselves by actively participating.

If you would enjoy engagement in your own learning, these programs are for YOU!

As a participant, expertise in any of the topics being offered is not required. All you need to bring is an enthusiasm for learning, an interest to contribute to group discussions or simply to listen. Starting in October we launch with 3 exciting programs: The NEW Retirement, Ethics, and Experiential Travel.

LEARN AND TEACH BY SHARING

All CDL programs are:

- Planned, presented and facilitated by volunteers
- Peer-led, interactive workshops, discussion and study groups
- Held in a Jewish milieu

Light refreshments will be provided at each session, courtesy of the Slodovnick Endowment Fund.

THE NEW RETIREMENT

Will you be able to afford your dreams or be stuck chasing them without enough money? Will your relationships improve or will new conflicts arise?

Join us and our presenters to discuss the many factors which help create a smooth transition from work to a rewarding 'zoomer' retirement. Share your observations as you learn from the experience of others.

Are you worried that an underfunded health care system will impair – or even shorten – your life? Can anything be done about that?

Let's get together to frame important societal themes like these. Have your say in some lively discussions that will help you understand critical issues more broadly and deeply.

Holiday Food Ideas

Memories of my mother – pan pals share recipes

Norene Gilletz
Special to The CJN

It's always such a special treat when my "pan pals" share their treasured recipes for well-loved holiday dishes. Everyone has their favourite foods that they look forward to sharing with family and friends for the High Holidays. In our family, it's gefilte fish (the salt-and-pepper version), chopped liver, tangy sweet and sour meatballs, tender brisket slices, golden-roasted chicken, all kinds of kugels (some sweet, some savoury), plump, potato-filled knishes, carrot tsimmes, kasha and bow ties, mock kishka, fragrant honey cake, cinnamon twist cookies, Dutch apple cake – the list goes on and on. Weeks before the holidays arrive, the freezing frenzy begins.

I firmly believe that the most loved recipes are the ones we learned from our very first cooking teacher – our mom. Here are some recipes and recollections shared by my "pan pals" over the miles, recipes from their mothers' kitchens. I hope that these nostalgic food memories will tweak the golden-coloured memories hidden in the corners of your mind, reminding you of some of the marvelous meals you first tasted in your mother's kitchen. Wishing you and yours a happy, healthy and sweet New Year – cook in good health!

This will be my first Rosh Hashanah without my mother – she passed away last December just after Chanukah. Each year, my mom and I would discuss traditional holiday recipes and compare them to contemporary ones that we'd heard about – and then we would usually make the recipe the same way we did in previous years. Tradition, tradition! Mom and I would always discuss her carrot tsimmes (she often cooked a big fat knaidel in the middle, but sadly, I don't have the recipe), her scrumptious honey cake (my mom always used tea for the liquid and insisted that nothing tasted better than a cake made with buckwheat honey), and her legendary potato knishes. She often included leftover meat or chicken that she ground up and added to the potato filling, giving it a fabulous flavour.

A few years ago, when my son Doug came to Toronto for a family visit, he insisted on learning how to make potato knishes together with his Bubbie Belle. They covered my dining room table with an old white sheet and dusted it (as well as my dining room floor!) with flour, while I quietly cringed in the kitchen, thinking about the mess I'd have to clean up when they were done. Bubbie Belle showed Doug how to roll out the dough until it was paper-thin. She taught him how to cut each knish using the side of her hand in a sawing motion – and her grandson, the chef, adeptly followed her lead. Then he cleaned up the mess and we snacked on those plump, scrumptious knishes right from the oven.

BELLE RYKISS' BEST-EVER POTATO KNISHES

Knishes are the ultimate Jewish soul food! Watching my late mother, Belle Rykiss, make knishes was one of my first childhood memories. My mom used to mix up the dough by hand in a big bowl, but years later, when she got a food processor, she found it did the job much faster and better.

Knish Dough:
2 eggs
1/2 cup oil
1/2 cup warm water
2 1/2 cups flour
2 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. salt
Potato Filling:
8 medium potatoes, peeled and cut in chunks
3 or 4 medium onions, chopped
1/4 cup oil
2 eggs
salt and pepper to taste
Optional: 1 to 2 cups ground cooked chicken or meat

For the dough: Process eggs, oil and water in the food processor using the steel blade until mixed, about 5 seconds. Add remaining ingredients and process just until blended, about 8 seconds. Do not over-process or dough will become tough. Cover dough and let stand while you prepare filling.
For the filling: Cook potatoes in boiling salted water until tender, about 20 minutes.

News about PregVit® and PregVit folic 5® Prenatal/Postpartum Multivitamins

Since March 2008, Canadian women have access to certified Kosher prenatal/postpartum multivitamins PregVit® and PregVit folic 5®.

In addition to being certified Kosher, the Kashruth Council of Canada has acknowledged that PregVit® and PregVit folic 5® are also in full compliance with Passover requirements, even though it is not reflected in the current COR symbol appearing on the packaging.

Therefore a new Chometz free COR symbol has been provided and will appear on the coming revised packaging before next Passover. In the meantime, Canadian women using the current PregVit® and PregVit folic 5® can rest assured that their prenatal/postpartum multivitamins are suitable for Passover.

Women planning a pregnancy should discuss with their attending healthcare professional which PregVit® or PregVit folic 5® multivitamin supplement should help them achieve the level of folic acid they need according to their specific health status.

Tsimmes is a wonderful blend of flavours

The tsimmes

Drain well. Return saucepan to heat for about 1 minute to remove excess moisture, shaking pan to prevent scorching. Mash potatoes with a potato masher. If you have some leftover cooked chicken or pot roast, grind it in a food processor on the steel blade and mix into the potato filling.

Sauté the onions in hot oil in a large skillet until nicely browned. Combine potato mixture with fried onions, oil, eggs and seasonings. Mix well.

Assembly: Divide dough into 4 pieces. Work with 1 piece at a time on a floured surface; coat dough lightly on all sides with a little flour and pat into a rectangle. Roll as thin as possible into a large rectangle. (My mother would sometimes stretch out the dough on the back of her hands.) Place a row of filling about 2 inches wide along the longer side of the rectangle, about 1 inch from edge. Roll up into a long roll. Using the edge of your hand, press down on the roll, and use a sawing motion to cut through dough completely. Repeat every 2 inches. Turn knishes on end, pressing cut edge in slightly. Repeat with remaining dough and filling.

Bake on a parchment-lined baking sheet in a preheated 350-degree oven about 35 minutes, or until golden. Yield: 24 to 30 knishes. Keeps 3 days in the refrigerator (providing that you hide them well). Reheat well, but underbake slightly. Reheat them uncovered at 350 for 12 to 15 minutes. Freeze well.

Roberta Scher of Atlanta, Ga., is the co-founder of www.koshereye.com along with her friend and business partner, Lois Held. We've often shared recipes and reminiscences via e-mail and phone calls, and several of my recipes are on their website.

Roberta's mother, Rose Schoen Snyder, the youngest of five children, was born in 1918 in Siedlce, Poland. Rose sailed into New York in 1929 aboard the U.S. President Harding. Her father had been in America for seven years preparing the way for his family. Along with a generations-old pair of silver Shabbat candlesticks, her mother arrived with only one other family heirloom – the traditional recipes that she and her family had always prepared. These recipes, along with the candlesticks are still treasured by their family.

ROSE SCHOEN SNYDER'S FAMILY CHOLENT RECIPE

Submitted by http://www.koshereye.com. (Adapted from the original recipe brought from Siedlce, Poland by Rose Schoen Snyder.)

In Siedlce, a heavy pot with uncooked cholent was delivered by hand to the community oven in the shtetl bakery on Friday afternoon, and carefully retrieved for Shabbat lunch on Saturday.

3 onions, chopped
2 lb. beef flanken
8 to 10 potatoes, peeled and cut up a "hand full" of barley salt, paprika, pepper
cholent "kugel" (see recipe below)

Place all ingredients in a heavy ovenproof pot, adding "kugel" on top. Add enough water to cover all ingredients except the kugel (see note below).

Cover pot with lid and bake in oven at 210 overnight, or for at least 12 hours.

Cholent "Kugel": Mix 3 eggs, 1/8 cup water and 3/4 cup matzah meal. Combine batter until it is the consistency of matzah ball batter. Create 2 to 3 mini-loaves or about 12 balls and drop on top of the cholent.

Slow Cooker Method: All the above ingredients can be cooked in a slow cooker on the low setting. Additional seasonings such as onion soup mix, fresh herbs, and beans may be added to the cholent mixture. Yield: 6 servings.

Naomi Reiter Bruni of Toronto strongly believes in preserving memories through food. In her blog, My Mother's Treasure: A Daughter's Journey of Discovery http://mymotherstreasure.blogspot.com/, there is a beautiful photo of Naomi's mom, Carol Joy Reiter. Naomi writes, "Though she is still with us in body, Alzheimer's has stolen my mother away from us far too soon, before she could organize her memories and stories for her grandchildren and the generations to come. I intend to build that legacy in her place, using her personal, handwritten recipes and those of her mother, grandmothers, aunts and family friends. I've started this blog as a tribute to my beloved mother, who instilled her love of homemaking, cooking and baking in me and my daughters. Naomi shared her mom's treasured recipe for tsimmes, along with the following message: "My mom, Carol Joy Reiter, made this recipe for every yom tov meal, and it was always a hit, especially with my Italian Catholic best friend, Diane, who got the recipe from my mom and served it for a dinner party one evening!

CAROL JOY REITER'S TSIMMES

8 medium sweet potatoes (peeled, boiled, mashed)
1 pkg. pitted prunes, halved
1 (19-oz.) can crushed pineapple in juice
6 to 8 thin carrots, cut in rounds
4 tbsp. brown sugar
1/2 tsp. powdered ginger
1/4 tsp. white pepper

Combine all ingredients in a large mixing bowl. Divide mixture in half and transfer to two greased 2-litre casseroles; cover and refrigerate. It will keep this way for 48 hours.

Bake covered in a preheated oven at 350 for 1 hour. Then uncover and bake for an additional 30 minutes. Once tsimmes is baked, it will keep for 3 to 4 days in the refrigerator. Yield: 8 servings.

Chicken with fruit for a sweet year

Eileen Goltz
Special to The CJN

In my house, the first food that comes to mind for holiday dinners (after challah and wine) is chicken. Roast chicken, baked chicken, stuffed chicken, grilled chicken. I have also served chicken with rice, chicken with noodles, chicken with potatoes, chicken with couscous and chicken with quinoa.

I have rounded up some chicken and fruit recipes so that we're guaranteed to have a sweet and healthy new year.

ZESTY BAKED LEMON CHICKEN

1 egg
2 tbsp. lemon juice
2 tsp. water
1/2 tsp. cayenne pepper
1/2 tsp. paprika
4 boneless, skinless chicken breasts, pounded thin
1/2 cup breadcrumbs
1/2 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. black pepper

Preheat oven to 400. Grease a 9x13-inch baking pan. In a large bowl, combine the egg, 1 tbsp. lemon juice, water, paprika and cayenne. Dip the chicken in the egg mixture, making sure to coat all sides.

In another bowl, combine the breadcrumbs, salt and pepper. Remove chicken pieces from egg mixture and press into breadcrumbs, coating all sides with crumbs. Place chicken pieces in a single layer in a prepared baking dish and bake for 15 minutes. Carefully turn chicken pieces and bake for an additional 10 minutes or until cooked through and golden. To serve, place the chicken on a platter and sprinkle the top with the remaining lemon juice.

CHERRY CHICKEN

1 lb. frozen pitted sweet cherries
1/2 cup orange juice
1/2 cup soy sauce
1/4 cup brown sugar
1/4 cup honey
2 tbsp. lemon juice
1 tsp. minced garlic
1/4 tsp. ginger
2 tsp. cornstarch (optional)
3 to 4 lb. boneless skinless chicken thighs/breasts
3 tsp. margarine
1/2 cup flour
2 eggs, beaten
panko breadcrumbs
salt and pepper

Preheat oven to 350. In the bowl of a food processor, combine 2/3 lb. of the cherries, orange juice, soy sauce, brown sugar, honey, lemon juice, garlic, cornstarch if using and ginger. Process until combined and set aside.

Cut the chicken into nice size pieces. Dredge them in the flour, dip them in the beaten eggs and then roll them in the breadcrumbs. Melt the margarine and sear the outside of the chicken but don't cook it all the way through. Place the chicken in a lightly greased baking pan and bake for 20 minutes. Turn the chicken over and then pour the sauce over the top and add the remaining cherries. Bake an additional 20 to 30 minutes until the chicken is done and the sauce is thickened.

You could make the chicken ahead of time to just before you put on the sauce and then freeze it. Defrost and then pour the sauce on just before the last 30 minutes of cooking. Cooking time may vary depending on how much chicken you make and how crispy you want the chicken. Serves 6.

Kugel completes break the fast meal

Judy Kancigor
Special to The CJN

Jews know all about fasting – Tisha b'Av, Yom Kippur, not to mention intermittent poverty-induced starvation. We also know all about breaking fasts, so when it comes to the delicious tradition of post-Yom Kippur break-the-fast, we're all over it! Here are some mouth-watering suggestions for this year.

No break-the-fast spread would be complete without a kugel, and this one comes from Sarah Entin of Fullerton, Calif., who grew up in the tiny town of Ponedel, Lithuania. "My father left for America when I was only five," she remembered, "but my mother couldn't leave his mother, who lived with us, so we didn't join him until my grandma died in 1938."

Sarah, her mother and two brothers fled Europe literally as the door was closing behind them. She had not seen her father in years. "We were so lucky to get out. So many of our relatives were killed in the Holocaust."

It's hard to believe that this accomplished lady, who has spent a lifetime of service to Jewish organizations and her synagogue, was once a frightened schoolgirl. "The hardest thing I ever did in my life was learn English," she said. "I was in such a hurry to fit in. The first time I was called on to give a report I was shaking." Now a grandma of 10, Sarah still makes Rosh Hashanah dinner each year for her family, a bittersweet tradition since her husband Lou's death in 1998.

"My brisket is already in the freezer," she said when we spoke before the holiday, "and, of course, I must make my sweet and sour meatballs, the kids' favourite."

After a day of fasting and prayer on Yom Kippur, the Entins sit down for a dairy break-the-fast dinner. "We have lox and bagels, herring, gefilte fish and, of course, noodle kugel," one variation or another traditionally popping up at Jewish gatherings. Sarah has been making her mother's version for at least 40 years. "Naturally I doctored up her recipe. She always used to ask why mine tasted so much better than hers!"

Ever since I brought my rugelach to my bat mitzvah celebration last year (better late than never!) they've become my most asked for potluck addition, and this year is no exception. Rugelach (the word means "little twists" in Yiddish) are rolled and filled crescent shape cookies with roots in Austrian history. As the story goes, in 1793, Austrian bakers celebrating the lifting of the Turkish siege of Vienna created pastries with a crescent shape to represent the Ottoman flag. Some say the croissant has similar ancestry. History, shmistory. We're talking about a rich butter and cream cheese dough with a sweet filling, a labour-intensive exercise to make, but so worth it!

Before our big day, two of my classmates, Sue Rosen and Max Litt, offered to come to my kitchen and help. Neither had ever made rugelach before, but they quickly got the hang of it, and our little assembly line turned out 280 pastries in about three hours.

(That is not to say that all 280 made it to the temple, however. You wouldn't expect us to serve any misshapen ones, would you? In the interest of presentation, all rejects were gobbled… I mean eaten by our families in the privacy of our own homes.) Brushing the pastries with melted butter is a brilliant technique I picked up from my cousin Staci Robbins years ago when she visited from Atlanta on a high school trip. She mentioned that her Grandma Claire taught her to do this so that they would brown without overbaking (not to mention what it does for the taste.)

Have an easy fast – and break it deliciously!

Rugelach, a treat from the Old Country

Combine all ingredients. Pour into large baking pan and refrigerate overnight or at least 4 hours. Will be loose before refrigeration but will set when chilled.

When ready to bake, mix topping. Sprinkle over pudding. Dot with butter and bake at 350 for 1-1/2 hours or until golden brown. Serves 15 to 20. Freezes well.

RUGELACH

Adapted from Cooking Jewish: 532 Great Recipes from the Rabinowitz Family (Workman) by Judy Bart Kancigor

Dough

1 lb. unsalted butter, at room temperature
2 packages (8 oz. each) cream cheese, at room temperature
4 cups all-purpose flour
2 tsp. sugar
1/2 tsp. salt

Filling

1 cup sugar
1 tbsp. ground cinnamon
3 cups pecans or walnuts, toasted and chopped
1 1/4 cups sweetened flaked or shredded coconut
1 1/2 cups raisins
about 1 1/2 cups seedless raspberry or apricot jam about 5 tbsp. unsalted butter, melted

Cream butter and cream cheese on medium speed until blended and smooth. Mix flour with salt and sugar. Reduce speed to low and add gradually until smooth. Wrap well with plastic wrap and refrigerate 2 hours to overnight. To make filling, mix sugar, cinnamon, nuts, coconut and raisins.

Preheat oven to 350. Line several baking sheets with parchment paper.

Divide dough into eight portions and use one at a time, keeping remainder refrigerated. Gently knead dough until soft enough to roll. Roll dough on lightly floured board or between two sheets of waxed or parchment paper, and cut out a 10- to 12-inch round (I use a pot lid with a sharp edge). Spread thin layer of jam over dough to 1/2 inch of the edge. Sprinkle with about 1/2 cup of filling. Using a pizza wheel, cut into 12 wedges (like a pie). Roll up each triangle, starting at large end. With the tip end down, bend each cookie slightly to form a crescent shape. Place on prepared baking sheets and brush with melted butter.

Bake, two sheets at a time, on bottom third and top third oven racks, rotating sheets from top to bottom and front to back halfway through, until rugelach are lightly golden, 20 to 25 minutes. They will seem soft, but will firm up on cooling. Carefully transfer to a wire rack to cool. Makes 8 dozen.

The side dish dilemma

Sue Epstein
Special to The CJN

If you're like me, whether it be for a holiday, Shabbat or a company meal, it's easy to decide on a main course and dessert, but then comes the side dish dilemma. What to have with the brisket or roast chicken? How to choose?

Aside from taste, think of texture and colour when choosing a side dish. Too much of any colour on a plate can be boring. Vegetables can add interest – dark greens, soft yellows, orange. A plate of sliced roasted chicken is more appealing when a colourful vegetable or side dish is added rather than when the same chicken is paired with only white or pale yellow vegetables.

HAWAIIAN SWEET POTATO CASSEROLE

6 large sweet potatoes (or 40-oz. can)
6 tbsp. butter or margarine
2 tsp. salt
6 firm, ripe bananas, sliced
1 cup light brown sugar, mixed with 1 tsp. cinnamon
16 oz. crushed pineapple
1 cup pineapple juice, mixed with 1 tsp. lemon juice
2 tbsp. honey

Raw sweet potatoes: wash, scrub and place in cold water. Cover, bring to a boil and parboil until they still show a little resistance when pierced with the tip of a sharp knife. Drain, cool slightly and peel. Canned sweet potatoes: Drain. Check can for salt content and you may wish to adjust salt accordingly.

Slice potatoes 1/2-inch thick. Grease a heatproof casserole dish with a little of the butter. Arrange in alternate layers starting with the sweet potatoes dotted with butter and salt, then the bananas sprinkled with brown sugar-cinnamon mixture, then the crushed pineapple. End with the sweet potatoes or the crushed pineapple.

Combine the pineapple juice and lemon juice and honey and pour over the mixture. Bake in a preheated oven at 350 for 40 minutes, or until browned on top. Makes 8-10 servings.

WILD RICE WITH CRANBERRIES AND CARMELIZED ONIONS

2 cups chicken broth
1/2 cup brown rice
1/2 cup wild rice
3 tbsp. pareve margarine
3 medium onions, sliced into thin wedges
2 tsp brown sugar
1 cup Craisins (sweetened, dried cranberries)
1/2 tsp. finely grated orange zest

Combine chicken broth and both types of rice in a medium saucepan. Bring to a boil over medium-high heat. Reduce heat to low. Cover and simmer 45 minutes or until rice is tender and the liquid is absorbed.

Meanwhile, melt margarine in a medium skillet over medium-high heat. Add onions and brown sugar. Cook 6 minutes or until liquid is absorbed and onions are soft and translucent. Reduce heat to low. Slowly cook onions, stirring often, for 25 minutes or until they are caramel color. Stir in dried cranberries.

Cover and cook over low heat for 10 minutes or until cranberries swell. Gently fold cranberry mixture and orange zest into cooked rice. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

SLOW ROASTED TOMATOES

These tomatoes have a delicious sweet, intense flavour.

8-10 ripe plum tomatoes
2 tsp. superfine sugar
2 tsp. sea salt or kosher salt
2 tsp. freshly ground black pepper
3-4 cloves garlic, thinly sliced

Before we turn around, it's time to start preparing for the much-anticipated break-the-fast gathering that ends Yom Kippur the very next week. Breaking the fast is a comforting event. If missing one meal seems tough, missing three meals and perhaps a few snacks is indeed gruelling.

Cooking for the break-the-fast dinner is also a challenge, as working in the kitchen is forbidden during Yom Kippur. Therefore, consider my suggestions for a meal of dairy dishes that are not only comforting for empty stomachs, but also easy to prepare well in advance. Along with steamed vegetables and fresh fruit, this menu can be on the table in minutes.

CHERRY CREAM CHEESE

Have this delightful sweet treat ready to serve on challah or crackers, to enjoy the moment the holiday ends.

1 cup dried cherries
1 cup water
2 packages of light cream cheese
1/2 cup toasted chopped nuts, pecans or walnuts
1 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
zest of one lemon

In a small pot bring water to a boil and add dried cherries. Reduce heat and cook cherries until the liquid is reduced to about 1 tbsp. Cool.

Soften cream cheese. Mix cheese together with the nuts, cherries and one tablespoon of the cherry liquid, lemon juice and zest. Cover and refrigerate. May be made several days ahead.

TWICE BAKED SPINACH AND PASTA FRITTATA

This remarkable frittata can be prepared several days in advance and tastes even better after the second time in the oven.

1 lb. prewashed spinach
2 cups dry elbow macaroni
6 large eggs, beaten
1 cup grated Parmesan cheese, Reggiano or similar
1 cup cottage cheese, pressed dry, 0.5 per cent milk fat
1/2 tsp. salt, plus salt for boiling water
1/4 tsp. pepper
4 tbsp. Parmesan cheese

Spinach and pasta fritatta

Cook macaroni in salted boiling water for 8-10 minutes, or until tender

Pour macaroni into a colander and run under cold water. Drain.

Wilt spinach in the microwave 2 to 4 minutes – do not dry out spinach. Cool spinach and squeeze out water over a strainer, then chop spinach

In a large bowl, combine chopped spinach, macaroni, eggs, Parmesan, cottage cheese, salt and pepper. Spray a 9x12-inch Pyrex dish with canola oil. Put macaroni mixture into the baking dish and sprinkle with remaining Parmesan cheese. Bake in a 350-degree oven for 30 to 40 minutes, or until the edges brown.

Reheat the frittata at 350 for 15 to 20 minutes, or bake for 20 to 30 minutes if you want the frittata to have a crunchy top.

PINEAPPLE WALNUT LOAVES

Something a little bit different. A satisfying treat for any time of the year.

Cake
1 cup butter or margarine
1 cup sugar
3 eggs
1/2 tsp. pure vanilla extract
1 1/2 cups 2 per cent milk
1 tsp. baking soda
2 tsp. baking powder
2 1/2 cups all purpose flour
Pineapple Mixture
1/4 cup brown sugar
2 tbsp. butter or margarine, melted
1 cup pineapple tidbits, well drained
1/2 cup walnuts, chopped

In food processor, combine butter and sugar. Mix in eggs and vanilla. Mix together baking soda and milk and add to processor. Add baking powder and flour and pulse until combined.

In a separate bowl, mix together the pineapple, brown sugar, butter and walnuts.

Prepare two loaf pans with canola oil spray. Use 1/2 of the batter, dividing it into the two pans.

Then divide 1/2 of the pineapple mixture between each pan of batter. Divide remaining batter between each pan and then spoon the rest of the pineapple mixture over each pan.

Bake together in a 350-degree oven for 35-40 minutes, or until a toothpick inserted in each loaf comes out clean and dry.

Cool cake before removing from loaf pan. Wrap Pineapple Walnut Loaves in plastic wrap and refrigerate. Loaves keep well for several days.

Side dish dilemma

Preheat the oven to its lowest setting –probably 250. Line a large-rimmed baking sheet with parchment paper and brush paper with 3 tbsp. oil. Halve the tomatoes lengthwise and lay them, cut side up, in a single layer on a large baking sheet. Mix together the sugar, salt and pepper, then sprinkle over the cut surface of the tomatoes. Place a few slices of garlic on each tomato half. Roast in the oven, undisturbed, for 3 to 4 hours, until they shrivel up. Let cool. Refrigerate and use within a few days. Makes 6-8 servings.

BUTTERNUT SQUASH TART

2 medium butternut squash
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 medium onion, diced
1 tsp. dark brown sugar
1/2 tsp. dried thyme, crushed
1/2 tsp. nutmeg
2 eggs
3/4 cup breadcrumbs
1 tbsp. salt
pepper to taste
1 sheet puff pastry, thawed

Peel and cut the squash into large chunks. Boil squash in water until soft, 15-20 minutes. Drain well and mash. Set aside to cool. Sauté onion in oil, in a small frying pan until translucent. Add to mashed squash. Add sugar, thyme and nutmeg. Whisk in eggs and breadcrumbs. Set aside.

Preheat oven to 350. Cut pastry sheet in half. Place one half into a 13-inch tart pan with a removable bottom. Press dough into bottom of pan and up the sides. Prick dough all over. Spread squash filling evenly over dough. With remaining half of pastry, cut into strips and make a lattice pattern on top of the tart. Brush the edges with water to adhere lattice strips to sides of the tart.

Bake 1 hour or until pastry is puffed and filling is set. If not serving immediately, refrigerate and reheat for 10 minutes at 350. Makes 10 servings.

Chicken a key part of holiday meals

KIDDIE COCKTAIL CHICKEN

6 whole chicken breasts split
6 chicken legs and thighs
3 (16-oz.) cans fruit cocktail, liquid reserved
2/3 cup soy sauce
1 tsp. minced garlic
2 (10-oz.) jars sweet and sour sauce

Preheat oven to 350. In a large roasting pan place the chicken, skin side up. In a bowl, combine the syrup from the fruit cocktail, soy sauce and garlic. Mix to combine and pour it over the chicken. Bake, uncovered, for about 40 minutes, basting often. Remove the chicken from the oven and drain the sauce into a saucepan. Set the chicken aside to cool.

Add the sweet and sour sauce to the saucepan and bring the mixture to a boil. Reduced the heat and cook for about 20 minutes until the sauce reduces to about 3-1/2 cups and has thickened. Pour the sauce over the chicken.

You can, at this point cover the chicken with foil and refrigerate for a day or two ahead of when you want to serve it. Or you can return the chicken, uncovered, to the oven and cook an additional 30 to 40 minutes, basting frequently. Add drained fruit and bake, uncovered for 25 to 30 minutes longer. Serves 12.

RASPBERRY PEACH CHICKEN

1 cup fresh or frozen unsweetened raspberries
1 1/2 cups fresh or frozen peaches, peeled and sliced
1/2 cup white wine
3 tbsp. honey
1/2 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp.pepper
2 lb. boneless skinless chicken breast or thighs, cut into pieces
2 to 3 tbsp.olive oil
additional raspberries, if desired

Preheat oven to 350. Place raspberries, peach slices, wine and honey in a food processor or blender. Process for about 1 minute or until the mixture is smooth. Pour the mixture into a saucepan and heat to a simmer. Season the chicken with salt and pepper. Heat a grill pan using 1 tbsp. of oil. In batches, using more oil when necessary, sear the chicken on both sides and then place it in a 9x13-inch baking dish.

Pour 1/2 the sauce over the chicken. Cover with foil and bake for 20 minutes. Remove the foil, flip the chicken pieces over and bake an additional 10 to 15 minutes until the chicken is done. To serve, place the chicken on a platter and drizzle just a little of the sauce over the top and garnish with additional raspberries. Serves 4.

2011 | MAZEL WINES

For over 40 years Mazel Wines has pioneered the Kosher wine renaissance

Who knew that the amazing quality and selection of Kosher wines you enjoy today are available due to the efforts of an enterprising North York entrepreneur?

MAZEL WINES started in the 60's when it was all but impossible to purchase high quality Kosher wines in Toronto. Since then, Mrs. Beila Adler, owner and operator of Mazel Wines at 3858 Bathurst St., has fought and won the right to expand the selection and variety of wines that we enjoy today. When Mrs. Adler and her family moved to Toronto from Brooklyn in 1964 an early visit to the liquor store revealed that the wine they bought in the States was not available locally. "I was told you cannot bring that wine here, you have to buy it from the Liquor Board. 'Fine,'" she replied, "where's the Liquor Board? What's their number?"

With a shy smile Mrs. Adler explains, "By now I'm very tame, but back then I was, oh, I don't know what word to use... 'Earnest?'" she laughs. "So I made an appointment, spoke to the manager, and he said, 'Show me there's a need for it.'" Undaunted, Mrs. Adler gathered more than enough evidence that there was a solid market waiting to be serviced and, by 1966, the Board started expanding the selection beyond the ubiquitous Manischewitz and Shapiro brands.

"The people in the community wanted access to different wines that were not available here," she recalls, "so I went to New York and became an agent for these brands for which there was demand but no supply."

Providing the Jewish community with quality service, as well as quality product, is the priority for Mazel Wines. With over 40 years of unique experience, educating the consumer is a responsibility they take very seriously. Mrs. Adler pulls out a creased piece of paper with a few typed sentences on it. "I read this somewhere, I can't recall where, but it has become our motto," she explains. It reads: "Excellence is more than just a word. It is a commitment in our relationship with our clients, our employees and our community. We strive to promote and encourage excellence within and beyond our company."

Mazel Wines is more than just a supplier to their customers. "If you make a simcha," Mrs. Adler says, "I will not just say, 'Go to the store and buy my wines.' No. You come here, we sit down with you." Mazel Wines has experts (and the expertise) to help not only select the appropriate wines and liquors, taking into account both the menu and the budget, but also help plan the occasion, from picking the wines to choosing the after dinner liqueurs.

Originally, the Kosher wine world meant Kiddush Wines from Europe, few of which would pass muster for most connoisseurs. In the 70's this changed, very much for the better in terms of quality and variety. Through Mrs. Adler's efforts, the new evolution in wines became available in Toronto. There was some resistance at first and initially the process moved very slowly. Years passed but, in December 1997 as Mrs. Adler remembers, "I got myself an appointment with the Chair of the Liquor Board. He listened to me and I left him my whole file with all my concerns and why I felt we should have more listings. He said, 'Alright, I'll get back to you.' Well, I'm not one to wait, so I called up... and then called again." In time a committee was designated to investigate the Kosher wine industry and its customer base. Ultimately the LCBO recognized that the industry was "very ill-represented" and that demand was high. As a direct result of Mrs. Adler's efforts, in May 1998, the first exclusive Kosher wine kiosk in Ontario was opened at what is now called the Sobey's Plaza at Hilda and Clark.

"As a registered agent," says Mrs. Adler, "we service our clients with the whole package. We can look after purchasing all of the necessary wines, liqueurs and liquor for their simcha. We are, in essence, a one-stop provider with the expertise to advise on what is best suited to the food being served, and to advise on what quantities are necessary.

"We constantly search for high quality new wines that we can list and submit; and we debut our newest selections at elegant, formal tastings to help familiarize the public with new and better wines."

These days, in LCBO Kosher wine sections, you'll find wines from New York State, Austria, South America and other nations, along with the traditional vintners from France, Italy and, of course, Israel. And Mrs. Adler notes that the tastes of the Kosher Wine consumer have become more refined as well. "The Kosher consumer, whatever they do a whole year, comes Passover and Rosh Hashanah they will buy Kosher." But now, she observes, they are discovering the Kosher wines that are good enough to enjoy with any meal and on every occasion.

Although Mrs. Adler insists that her role is to help her customers enjoy the greatest selection and quality of wines available, her favourite role is in helping people by offering convenience and the benefit of her expertise. "I've been doing this for so many years and I've always enjoyed helping people make great simchas, seders or simply helping educate them about what great new products are out there." ■

Abbas rejects proposed draft statements

On recognition of Israel as a Jewish state, an older version of the Quartet proclamation offered "two states for two nations, with Israel as a Jewish state and the national home of the Jewish people."

Netanyahu agreed to compromise and allow the statement to speak of two national states, without mentioning a "Jewish state."

He also reportedly agreed to be more flexible on the length of future negotiations as well as on security assurances.

Abbas rejected all of the proposed draft statements, including Netanyahu's compromise revisions.

One U.S. proposal handed to Abbas was to ask the UN secretary general and the Security Council to have Palestine be accepted as a full UN member on condition that the membership be processed over a period of several months, at which time direct talks between Israel and the PA could resume along guidelines stipulated by the Quartet.

However, sources have indicated that Abbas has rejected that offer as well, with his aides saying that Abbas was interested in bringing the issue of Palestinian statehood to the General Assembly and to the Security Council at the same time, because of the length of time needed to process the proposal at the Security Council.

Mahmoud Abbas

Speaking of their repeated rejections of Quartet drafts, Palestinian officials have said that the United States was working in co-operation with Israel, adding that Blair spoke to them like an "Israeli diplomat" and not like an international emissary, and that U.S. Mideast envoy Dennis Ross used "undiplomatic language."

On Friday, Abbas said the Palestinians plan to approach the UN Security Council for full recognition, clarifying that they are seeking to delegitimize the occupation, not Israel, by taking the UN route for Palestinian statehood.

He stressed that Israel is a legitimate state, but that by continuing to build in the settlements and rejecting the internationally recognized borders of a future Palestinian state, it is engaging in illegitimate activity.

"What I will take to the UN will be the suffering and concerns of our people that have been taking place over 63 years living under the occupation," Abbas said, adding that the Palestinians, like all nations, deserve independence, and that the Palestinians want a state based on 1967 borders, with east Jerusalem as its capital.

Abbas said the Palestine Liberation Organization plans to continue to be the sole representative of the Palestinian people, not only at the diplomatic level, but also through the implementation of the necessary steps needed to bring about a Palestinian state.

Later in his speech, however, he touched upon the Cairo-brokered unity deal between the moderate West Bank-based Fatah and the more militant Gaza-based Hamas, saying that "there is nothing better than national unity between the West Bank and Gaza, and we will do everything we can to maintain this unity."

Abbas said collaboration between the West Bank and Gaza is a national duty, and they will continue to take steps to maintain this, "even if we differ on some issues."

In related news, diplomats at the United Nations said their support for the Palestinian statehood bid stems from fear of revenge from Muslim and Arab nations loyal to the Palestinian cause.

Sources said some countries will support the Palestinians not because they believe in their cause, but because Muslim and Arab countries may take punitive measures against them when they need support in the Security Council or in bids to be appointed to important UN bodies.

A senior western diplomat told Ha'aretz that the Non-Aligned Bloc's votes were of particular importance. "It is the largest regional bloc," he said, "and is greatly sympathetic to the Palestinian matter."

Hamas won't concede 'one inch'

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Hamas supports the formation of an independent Palestinian state that does not recognize Israel's existence and which does not concede "one inch" of historical Palestine, Hamas' Gaza leader said Sunday.

Last week, Hamas voiced its objection to an upcoming Palestinian bid to gain recognition at the United Nations, saying that such an effort infringes on the Palestinian refugees' right of return.

The move was not based on principles and "Hamas and other factions are not part of this step and do not support it," Salah Bardaweel, a senior Hamas leader in Gaza, told a workshop in Gaza City.

Speaking to the Palestinian legislative council in Gaza, Hamas leader Ismail Haniyeh was quoted by the French news agency AFP as reiterating his movement's opposition to the Palestinian Authority move at the UN, adding however that Hamas would support an independent Palestine on only part of what it considered to be "historic Palestine" if that state adheres to core Hamas principles.

"We repeat today that we are with the establishment of a Palestinian state on any liberated part of Palestinian land that is agreed upon by the Palestinian people, without recognizing Israel or conceding any inch of historical Palestine," Haniyeh was quoted as saying.

Elaborating on the main objection to the PA-led bid at the UN, Haniyeh reiterated the Hamas position that there could be "no mandate for any Palestinian leadership to infringe on Palestinian national rights, nor is there a mandate for any Palestinian actor to make historic concessions on Palestinian land or the right of the Palestinians, foremost among them the right of return."

"Given this position, we reiterate our rejection of this bid," he added, saying, however, that Hamas would "not place obstacles in the way of the establishment of a Palestinian state with full sovereignty."

Wikileaks cable casts spotlight on NIF

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

A U.S. diplomatic cable, released three weeks ago in a Wikileaks document dump, has brought increased scrutiny of the foreign funding of Israeli and Palestinian NGOs, including those that reject Israel as a Jewish state.

The cable, from the U.S. Embassy in Tel Aviv to the State Department, reports on Knesset deliberations in February 2010 on a bill to compel NGOs to reveal any funding from foreign political sources. The cable quoted NGO Monitor president Gerald Steinberg as pushing for the bill because ostensibly human rights organizations funded largely from Europe were conducting "political warfare" against Israel.

The cable goes on to quote a former senior official of the New Israel Fund saying the disappearance of Israel as a Jewish state "would not be the tragedy that Israelis fear since it would become more democratic."

The New Israel Fund quickly distanced itself from the statement attributed to its former grants director, Hedva Radanovitz.

"Her comments, as reported by Wikileaks, are her personal views. They do not reflect the policies or positions of the NIF. We valued Hedva's contribution to NIF, but it also is true that her viewpoints diverged from those of the organization and her resignation was largely due to her disagreement with the positions and direction of NIF," said a NIF statement.

However, Steinberg maintained the NIF has for years funded agencies that have been among Israel's most vocal critics. Some, such as Adalah, have called it an apartheid and racist state. Adalah, which describes itself as a human rights organization that defends Palestinian citizens of Israel, received more than $1.1 million from 2006 to 2009 and $476,000 in 2010 alone.

Mada al-Carmel, which receives funds from a partnership of the Ford Israel Fund and the NIF, received $100,000 in 2010, NGO Monitor stated. The watchdog group quotes Mada al-Carmel as saying global acceptance of a two-state solution is "regrettable."

Another NIF recipient, Coalition Women for Peace, is a leader of the global boycott, divestment and sanctions effort targeting Israel. From 2006 to 2009, it received grants totalling $389,497. NIF subsequently ended its support of the organization.

> The disappearance of Israel as a Jewish state 'would not be the tragedy that Israelis fear since it would become more democratic'

Other agencies that have received NIF funds include Association for Civil Rights in Israel, B'Tselem, Breaking the Silence, HaMoked and Physicians for Human Rights-Israel. "These NGOs were highly active in promoting the [UN] Goldstone report [on the Gaza War] and campaigning for international pressure against Israel," NGO Monitor asserted.

Jay Brodbar, executive director of NIF of Canada, said the Canadian branch of NIF sends no money to Adalah. Funds distributed by NIF Canada are earmarked for specific projects in Israel and do not go into a pool of money allocated by NIF.

"Our activities in Israel are vetted by our staff and our board. We have all kinds of accountability in place," Brodbar said.

In its response to the Wikileaks cable, NIF CEO Daniel Sokatch stated: "The Wikileaks cable demonstrates the way in which the ultra-nationalist agenda attempts to destroy the legitimate work of the human rights community.

"It's certainly understandable that back in February 2010 our former employee... was not optimistic about Israeli support for human rights and democracy. That was the month that the NIF itself first came under vicious attack, and the bill to penalize progressive civil society that's under discussion in the Wikileaks cable was just the tip of the iceberg in attempts to de-democratize Israel.

"I also believe more firmly than ever in the vision of Israel put forth by its Declaration of Independence. I know that the NIF's dedication to an Israel that is both Jewish and democratic could not be clearer. NIF is and always was a big tent organization – our staff, grantees and volunteer leadership reflect the gamut of views from the centre to the left, fiercely debated in Israel and elsewhere."

Steinberg, a monthly columnist for The CJN, said the diplomatic cable was written when the Knesset was considering legislation prompted by NGO Monitor's concerns that many politicized NGOs in Israel were being funded from abroad – mostly by European governments.

The cable noted 350 Israeli NGOs receive $18 million a year from the NIF. It also quoted Radovanitz saying the political left wing had disappeared in Israel and "the lack of domestic constituency for the NGOs."

Steinberg said there was no "right wing plot" to shut down the agencies. The issue, he said, was for "their source of funding to become a matter of the public record."

The NIF, Steinberg continued, "essentially led the campaign against the transparency legislation. They provided the seed money for these Israeli organizations that were the focus of the transparency legislation.

"European governments have followed the NIF lead."

The legislation that eventually passed requires "blanket reporting of all foreign government funding," Steinberg added.

Asked about the NIF's assertion that Radanovitz was speaking only in her personal capacity, Steinberg said, "She had worked in other organizations that were anti-Israel, so they should have known whom they were getting."

Palestinian leadership unreliable: Lieberman

Lieberman was then slated to fly to New York, where he was to join Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu at the UN General Assembly in a major diplomatic effort to stave off the initiative by the Palestinian Authority (PA) to achieve recognition for an independent Palestinian state.

"Any attempt to impose a political solution on the parties will result in the opposite of what is needed today," Lieberman said. "In the search for solutions, some countries try to place pressure on Israel." But doing so, he asserted, "is an attempt to evade reality."

Liberman planned to tell his colleagues at the United Nations that those interested in preserving the chance of achieving an understanding between Israel and the Palestinians must make it clear to Palestinian leaders that the international community will reject any unilateral initiative and will only support an agreement reached through negotiations between the parties.

He described the Palestinian leadership as unreliable. No amount of wishful thinking to the contrary, Lieberman said, alters the current hard-core facts on the ground.

As proof, he noted that the "Palestinian people is divided between the PA in the West Bank and 'Hamastan' in Gaza. The PA has postponed elections three times and they have simply refused to restart negotiations with Israel. When we asked [Palestinian leader Mahmoud] Abbas to take steps to stop the shooting at our people in the south, he told us: 'What do you want from me? I'm not responsible for Gaza. I'm not in power there.'"

Then Lieberman added, somewhat ironically but forcefully, "and yet he will tell the UN the opposite, that he represents all of the Palestinian people."

He dismissed as "nonsense" the often-expressed notion that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is the core issue in the Middle East that gives rise to much of the malaise and instability in the region. There is no link, Lieberman stated emphatically, between the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and the tumult of the "Arab Spring."

"The Arab world is a complicated place. There are many reasons for the turmoil in, for example, Bahrain, Libya, Tunisia, Yemen, Egypt and Syria." He cited three: the disparity in wealth between the very rich and the very poor; the theologically based struggle between Shia and Sunni Muslims, and the often-waged struggle for power and control among different factions within the countries.

Lieberman told The CJN he is determined to convey the message in New York that Israel's fight in the Middle East is also the fight of the entire free world. He urged the western world not to accede to the Palestinians' demands.

"It will send a bad message and set a bad example." Israel's battle in the region is not only about territory, it's about values, he emphasized.

Rabin rally cancelled

The annual rally marking the anniversary of the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin won't be held this November for the first time in 16 years. The late prime minister's daughter, Dalia Rabin, chairman of the Yitzhak Rabin Center, said the centre won't hold the event this year because of financial constraints and a yearly decrease in attendees. Tel Aviv's Rabin Square, site of the event, is being renovated and could not have hosted this year.

Envoy back in Jordan

Israel's ambassador to Jordan returned to Amman after being withdrawn in advance of an anti-Israel protest. The ambassador returned last Friday, two days after Israel withdrew its embassy staff from the Jordanian capital as a safety precaution. According to reports, only about 200 protesters turned out on Thursday in Amman for what had been billed as a "million man-march" against Jordan's peace treaty with Israel. Jordanian police prevented the protesters from marching on the embassy. The decision to remove the staff came several days after Egyptian demonstrators stormed Israel's embassy in Cairo, necessitating the emergency rescue of staff by Egyptian commandos.

Fogels' killer sentenced

A Palestinian man was sentenced to five consecutive life sentences for the murder of five members of the Fogel family in a West Bank Jewish settlement. Hakim Awad, 18, was sentenced March 13 in a West Bank military court. He had admitted guilt in the March 11 murders in Itamar, which is near his home in the West Bank town of Hawarta, and refused to express regret. The judges called the attack "an atrocious, bone-chilling and terrifying act." The five consecutive life sentences are equal to 130 years in prison. Awad and his cousin, Amjad Awad, 19, murdered Udi Fogel, 36, and Ruth Fogel, 35, and their children, Yoav, 11; Elad, 4; and Hadas, 3 months, in a Shabbat eve attack on their home in the northern West Bank. Amjad Awad has been convicted of the murders and is awaiting sentencing. Three of the Fogel children survived the attack: two were sleeping in a side bedroom and weren't discovered, and a daughter was out of the house at the time of the killings. She came home to discover the bodies.

Shipping firm cleared

The Obama administration lifted sanctions on an Israeli shipping firm it had charged with dealing with Iran. The United States in May had sanctioned the Ofer Brothers Group for providing a tanker valued at $8.65 million to an Iranian shipping company. The sanctions sparked a scandal in Israel, which has been at the forefront of efforts to isolate Iran because of the Islamic Republic's suspected nuclear weapons program. The State Department said it removed Ofer Brothers, but kept on the list three companies indirectly owned by the company. The firm, which maintained that the sale was inadvertent, told Associated Press that "the action clears our name." The brothers, widely respected and believed to be the richest men in Israel, died in the months intervening – Sammy in June at 89 and Yuli last week at 87.

Gilad Schalit's plight discussed at the UN

Dan Klein
JTA

NEW YORK — Noam Schalit, the father of captive Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit, wants his son's plight to be part of the discussion of Palestinian statehood at the United Nations this month.

In his view, Schalit's release should be a precondition of any vote at the United Nations on recognition of a Palestinian state.

Schalit was in New York earlier this month meeting with UN ambassadors from various nations, including pro-Palestinian ones, to make his case.

In at least one corner, Schalit won considerable sympathy: the New York City Council proclaimed Sept. 7 Gilad Schalit Day.

The point of Schalit's trip was to keep the issue of his son's captivity from being forgotten amid world events, and to use those events as a lever to secure Gilad's release.

"We hope he'll be home for Rosh Hashanah," Schalit told a meeting of the New York City Council, saying a prisoner-exchange deal between Israel and Hamas is "the only way."

In a 30-minute interview with JTA last Friday, Schalit talked about the need to put pressure on all sides using whatever tools are available. In the more than five years since Gilad Schalit was captured in a cross-border raid on the Israel-Gaza frontier in June 2006, the Schalit family has done all it can to make sure the plight of the captive soldier remains high on Israelis' minds.

Noam and Aviva Shalit, parents of Gilad Schalit, sit in front of a flag depicting an image of their son, at a protest tent set up outside Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's residence last year.

Schalit and his wife, Aviva, set up a protest tent opposite the prime minister's residence in Jerusalem that has not budged in more than two years. They've held nationwide marches, disrupted Independence Day ceremonies and prompted myriad campaigns to pressure the Israeli government to cut a deal with Hamas, including a recent one for Schalit's 25th birthday. There are Free Schalit wristbands, bumper stickers and banners.

Last week, Schalit met in the United States with American Jewish organizations to strategize on how to lobby the Obama administration to put more pressure on the Palestinian Authority, which he believes can pressure Hamas. After leaving New York, Schalit went to France, where he met with French President Nicolas Sarkozy and was able, with the help of the New York-based Foundation for Ethnic Understanding, to get several French Muslim leaders to publicly call on Hamas to release his son.

Schalit dismisses the notion that the Palestinian Authority cannot influence Hamas or does not share responsibility for his son's captivity.

"How can they say they have no leverage on Hamas?" he said. "The Palestinian Authority is going to the UN to appeal for one Palestinian entity, not two. They want one state for the Palestinian people. The Palestinian Authority cannot absolve itself of responsibility. It holds responsibility for all the Palestinian people."

Indirect negotiations between Israel and Hamas for Gilad Schalit's release resumed recently in Cairo, Schalit said, but he remains pessimistic.

"The new Egyptian administration has taken the lead again," Schalit said. "It is now new people, but Egyptians are the same. We need to urge the Egyptians to move on fast and effectively. We don't have another three years to spend with negotiations."

At the United Nations last week, Schalit's focus was the Palestinian Authority. He said he met with more a dozen UN ambassadors to urge them to block any statehood recognition until his son is free. Of particular importance, he said, were his meetings with countries that already have recognized the state of Palestine, such as Argentina.

"We are not dealing with politics," Schalit told JTA. "We are not asking them to vote for or against a Palestinian state. We just believe that a first step, as a precondition, they should comply with international law."

The leaders of the world, he said, have to tell the Palestinians, "Look, you cannot go on with this violation of international and humanitarian law and at the same time ask for legitimacy and recognition. It is very basic. They don't go together."

Sicilian Jews reach out to forgotten brethren

Alex Weisler
JTA

SIRACUSA, Italy — On her deathbed, Salvatore Zurzolo's grandmother confided a long-held secret: their family was Jewish.

Zurzolo, of Calabria in southern Italy, had been flirting with Judaism for years, ever since choosing to stay with Parisian Jews during a Catholic youth trip to the city when he was 18.

After his grandmother's confession, Zurzolo contacted the central Italian Jewish community in Rome and asked to begin the conversion process.

"For 20 years, I was told it was not possible," Zurzolo said.

But he didn't give up, keeping kosher, wearing a yarmulke and a Star of David necklace, and visiting Israel 10 times in two decades, according to his account.

Finally, last December, Zurzolo formally converted to Judaism with a dip in the ancient mikvah of Siracusa, Sicily's fourth-largest city and one of Italy's southernmost municipalities.

Last week, Zurzolo returned to the site of the ritual bath, which sits below an upmarket hotel, for a first-of-its-kind conference aimed at Ebrei di Ritorno, the Italian term for "returning Jews" – descendants of Jews forcibly converted during the Inquisition era who are now exploring the possibility of coming back to the religion.

The gathering, which brought together a passel of prominent Italian rabbis and more than a dozen mostly Sicilian descendants of Jews, was an important step for Siracusa: it marked the first time that the Union of Italian Jewish Communities, or UCEI, the umbrella group for the Italian Jewish establishment, offered formal recognition and support. Among the attendees were Rabbi Eliyahu Birnbaum, chief rabbi of Turin; Rabbi Shalom Bahbout, chief rabbi of Naples, and Rabbi Roberto Della Rocca, head of the UCEI's culture and education department.

Rabbi Stefano di Mauro

Sicily now has its first rabbi in 500 years, and Siracusa's tiny one-room synagogue – occupying the bottom floor of an apartment building in the city's outskirts and drawing from a revolving door of about 40 interested locals – is one of only two or three Jewish communities in Italy south of Naples.

Perhaps most important, Italian Jewry seems open to welcoming newly converted Jews from Siracusa. Rabbi Gadi Piperno, project manager for southern outreach for the Union of Italian Jewish Communities' department of education and culture, came to Siracusa for the recent outreach seminar.

"We used to say that Naples was the frontier" of Italian Jewry, he said. "But now, at the end of Italy, we have a community – so this is the new frontier."

At the two-day conference, participants told personal stories of discovering their heritage, pored over Torah passages – including the Book of Ruth, which is focused on the conversion of Naomi's daughter-in-law – and heard from Michael Freund, founder and chairman of the Shavei Israel Foundation, which seeks to facilitate connections between descendants of Jews, Israel and the Jewish people.

Freund, whose group has worked with descendants of Jews in India, South America, Poland and the Iberian Peninsula, said the Siracusa event was his first foray into the so-called anusim communities of Italy – descendants of forcibly converted Jews.

Sicily had a Jewish population of at least 50,000 at the time of the Inquisition, and Freund believes that welcoming back descendants of Jews is the best way to avenge the violence and intimidation of that era.

"The sweetest revenge for what the Inquisition did to these people's ancestors would be to bring back as many of these people as possible," he said.

Participants said they didn't find their way to Judaism by poring over family trees. The narrative varied by individual, but the gist was the same: there was a gut feeling, an inescapable, always-known truth – with or without the evidence to back it up.

Elisabetta Barbera made the trip from Rome to attend the conference. She said she suspects that her family has Jewish links and that definitive proof is not the point.

"Being 60, it's my right to die like a Jew. That's it," she said. "It's my feeling, my link, my faith."

Event attendees said the seminar made them feel less alone.

Maria La Cara travelled from the Sicilian capital of Palermo, nearly a three-hour drive. Raised Catholic, she began attending Pentecostal services at 18 and found herself getting consistently hung up on the word "Israel" when she came across it in prayers.

La Cara says one of her family's surnames, Scimonetto, is a common converso name in the southern Italian region of Reggio Calabria, but she has no definitive proof of Jewish ancestry.

"I think I'd feel better if I found out I was Jewish," she said. "If my past is more clear, then so is my present."

La Cara said she has received support from her family, but that's not a universal experience in heavily Catholic Sicily.

Carlo – a biochemistry student from Catania, about 40 minutes north of Siracusa – didn't want to provide his last name because of his family's discomfort with his growing Jewish identity.

When he was eight or nine years old, Carlo dreamt that his mother and grandmother told him he was Jewish; he has Jewish roots on both parents' sides. But when Carlo began exploring the religion in his mid-teens, it upset his family.

"My family is a total Sicilian family – it's Catholic," he said. "For them it's not a good decision. I'm not decided on whether I'll complete my path to Judaism."

Amid all the existential questions and sweeping rhetoric at the gathering were practical concerns. This was the central concern for Rabbi Stefano di Mauro, a Sicilian native who converted to Judaism when he was about 30 year old and was later told of his family's Jewish roots.

Now that Siracusa has a synagogue again, he is focused on making the city a welcoming place for the community of anusim.

"The next step is to create a permanent beit din" for the south and give the opportunity to the ones who want to come back to Judaism to be helped faster," he said. "I'm not so young anymore to get so excited, but it seems like God wants this to happen. So many things are coming together."

Next up is a Shabbaton weekend retreat in Calabria, at the southern tip of Italy's boot. Then in December, the Union of Italian Jewish Communities plans to hold a large event in Naples focusing on ethics and politics that also will serve as a chance to update the Italian Jewish community on the progress of the outreach initiative in the South.

Israeli trade minister drums up business during visit

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

As a representative of a country that is supposedly the target of a boycott movement, Israeli Industry, Trade & Labor Minister Shalom Simhon had a pretty gruelling schedule doing business on a recent visit to Canada.

The minister met with senior officers of the Royal Bank of Canada in Toronto to discuss investment opportunities in new media; he discussed homeland security issues with Ontario police chiefs and invited them to a conference in Israel; he visited MaRS (an organization that connects science, business and government), where he met with hospital directors, who are already slated to visit Israel as part of a mission; he met with representatives of the Ontario Clean Water Agency to talk about possible Israeli/Ontario collaboration in that sector; he travelled to Ottawa to meet his Canadian counterpart, International Trade Minister Ed Fast, and he rubbed shoulders with the glitterati at the Toronto International Film Festival, where he encouraged Hollywood machers to consider Israel for co-productions.

In the midst of that agenda, he toured the downtown offices of the Israel Economic Mission to Canada, where he affixed the mezuzah on a brand-new office space.

Simhon expanded on his Ontario mission in a press briefing at the offices of the Israel Economic Mission. Speaking through an interpreter, Simhon said RBC officials have already visited Israel and are expected again next month. They are looking for investment opportunities in new-media startups that they can introduce to their clients, he said.

Shalom Simhon

The RBC meeting was held "in order to examine opportunities for co-operation in the industrial sector of new media."

Sharon Kedmi, director general of the Israeli ministry, who accompanied Simhon, said many Israeli startups focus on new-media applications, which focus on the transfer of large amounts of data to various consumer gadgets such as television and smartphones.

"We connect these startups with the market," such as banks and other investors, Kedmi said.

RBC is an important partner in these ventures, as it is familiar with the Canadian market and has an extensive network of contacts to help facilitate the introduction of Israeli products to the market, Kedmi added.

Simhon said the ministry is hoping to assist Israeli firms sell medical equipment to Canadians while examining possible research and development collaborations.

Israeli companies are leaders in a number of medical technologies, he said. InSightec, for one, is developing ultrasound techniques to treat cancer, and Gamida Cell is developing technologies to use stem cells from non-controversial sources such as umbilical-cord blood to treat conditions such as leukemia, lymphoma and autoimmune diseases.

Simhon said Israel's economy is "strong." Its unemployment rate stands at 5.5 per cent, and the Standard & Poor's credit rating agency recently boosted Israel's sovereign debt rating from A to A+.

The upgrade is considered international recognition of Israel's economic strength. According to Ha'aretz, it could entice more foreign investment and will enable the government and local companies to take out cheaper loans on the international market. In announcing the upgrade, S&P said it was motivated by Israel's responsible economic policy during the global financial crisis in 2008 and Israel's high growth rate.

Asked about recent demonstrations in Tel Aviv, Simhon said, "The social protests caught us in a good situation to make changes."

The government saw the protests "in a positive manner." They were "within the norms of dialogue and within the Israeli conversation." He suggested a "new order" might emerge for the Israeli middle class.

A developed nation in a bad neighbourhood

Assa Sasson
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — In 2010, Israel passed a remarkable milestone: no longer a developing nation, it had achieved the status of developed, according to the index company MSCI. The firm moved Israel to its index that tracks developed nations, including the likes of Switzerland, France and Greece.

The joy was great. We heard from every dais in town that the upgrade would be a boon. Non-residents would stampede to invest, because the amount of money invested in developed nations is far greater than in developing ones.

In the roar of applause, one little detail was forgotten – Israel's neighbourhood. This is not a developed neighbourhood. One might say it isn't even a developing one. The Arab Spring only served to bring back a little thing that had receded into the background – geopolitical risk.

The world's investors aren't used to the sort of geopolitical risk that characterizes our neighbourhood. There's the risk that the drums of war will start to resonate at a pace dictated by mobs, that embassies will be overrun and set aflame, that the future will be bleak. When this risk turns into reality, risks that investors aren't accustomed to dealing with – they do what investors tend to do when their knees start to quake.

And thus the price of Israel's sovereign CDS (Credit Default Swap, which is insurance against default by the state) soared last week, rising to a peak of 1.78 per cent, lifting yields of Israeli government bonds.

To what safe harbour are investors fleeing? To American treasuries. Yes, it is true that yields on U.S. government bonds have fallen to new lows and that 10-year bonds are trading at a mean yield of 1.98 per cent.

As a result, the spread of Israeli government bonds against their U.S. counterparts (the difference between 10-year Israeli government bonds and 10-year treasuries) widened to 2.85 per cent. As a developed nation, the spread should have been around 1.5 per cent.

It seems almost as if bonds issued by Israel as a developing nation were better than bonds issued by Israel as a developed nation.

Actor comes back to Toronto for film festival

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Aaron Abrams is a rising star who had two movies in this month's Toronto International Film Festival (TIFF). He plays Seth Rogan and Sarah Silverman's brother in Sarah Polley's Take This Waltz and Nick Stahl's best friend in 388 Arletta.

The Canadian actor, writer and producer now lives in Los Angeles, but says he was thrilled to be back in his birthplace for TIFF.

"Toronto is my hometown, so of course being involved with a film that's in that festival has some extra juice to it," Abrams, 33, says. "It's also where my first film premièred, hopefully not my last. I think TIFF is just the bees knees."

Abrams says Take This Waltz is "an amazing, bittersweet relationship film starring Michelle Williams. She's in a happy marriage, but slowly starts to fall in love with a man who lives across the street."

The movie 388 Arletta "is quite different, not sweet at all. It's a creepy dark film about a man who finds out that someone is plotting to rip his life apart. It has a lot of twists in it. It's one of those films that's tough to talk about because anything you say is a spoiler."

With a long list of television and film roles under his belt, Abrams is making a name for himself in Hollywood. Aside from being a regular on TV shows, including Slings and Arrows, Rookie Blue and the animated series Producing Parker, Abrams is known for co-writing and starring in the controversial 2007 film *Young People F*cking*.

"It started with a conversation about how romantic comedies tend to end at the first kiss and 'sex comedies' like American Pie tend to be fun juvenile things about virgins trying to see their first boob or something," Abrams says.

"We wanted to write a sex comedy for adults, one that had some romance in it. We didn't see why sex and romance were exclusive in movies. They certainly aren't in real life."

YPF won Abrams a Canadian Comedy Award in 2009. It was one of the highest grossing Canadian films of all time, staying in theatres for more than 16 weeks.

Currently, Abrams is producing, writing and starring in an upcoming television series, Highland Gardens, and can be seen in The Chicago 8 in October with Gary Cole and Danny Masterson. He also has a guest role on NCIS: Los Angeles this year.

Abrams says Highland Gardens is about "a rundown motel in Hollywood where young 20-somethings live while they're trying to catch a break. It's sort of like the opposite of Entourage, as this is not about big fancy porn parties. It's about being a starving actor while having to wait tables at those big, fancy porn parties."

Highland Gardens has a lot of the humour that YPF is known for, but it is also very dramatic, he says. "I play a former child star who is actually quite well adjusted, but in order to get noticed, like by [gossip website] TMZ and stuff, he has to behave like he's a train-wreck in public. It's a pretty fun role."

Abrams says his passion for acting began in childhood. "Basically, I was an annoying kid who wanted attention. So when I was eight years old, my parents stuck me into some acting classes. Likely because they were fed up with me."

After theatre school, Abrams "grinded it out as an actor," and in his first two years, he played 13 roles without a name. "Policeman, security guard, guy in crowd, pizza guy, assistant, student, paramedic, fan, corporal, patient, reporter, pastor and sexy delivery guy" (his favourite).

He says they were all small parts with only a few lines, but he got to know his way around a set, became "less green" and got casting people to trust that he could do the job. Eventually, Abrams got bigger roles and was cast as a regular on the Canadian series Slings and Arrows.

"Slings and Arrows was memorable because it was my first real gig. I also got to work with an extremely talented cast. That Sexy Delivery Guy role was memorable just because it was so ridiculous. First off, I was playing a guy who had the word "sexy" in his title, which is preposterous. Secondly, the scene consisted of Christina Hendricks [who plays the sexy Joan in the TV series Mad Men] asking me out on a date and me turning her down. Double preposterous."

Aaron Abrams in Take This Waltz

While Slings and Arrows was a milestone, Abrams says he prefers acting for film because there is a beginning, middle and end. "TV is fun, too. You just have to be the guy, and every week they throw you a new script of situations your guy has to deal with. But ends are the most interesting. And TV roles never have those – it's always back next week."

Abrams' dream role would involve learning a new skill, he says. "That's the nice thing about being an actor. In order to do a role well, you sometimes have to adopt whole new hobbies you never thought you would get to try. For example, if I got cast as a boxer, I'd have to learn how to box. And I'd have to take six months off just to box every day. In Amelia, I played a pilot, so I had to learn how to do that. Roles where you get the chance to acquire a whole new set of skills are amazing."

Abrams' acting future is bright, as he looks forward to the première of Highland Gardens in 2012. "Jesus Henry Christ should come out next year as well. It's a super fun, sweet film produced by Julia Roberts, starring Toni Collette. After that, my girlfriend will probably stick me into some acting classes. Likely because she is fed up with me."

As for his advice to aspiring actors, Abrams says, "Get into every class you can. Work your ass off. Be humble. Don't stop doing those three things. Ever. Especially that humble thing. You play pretend for a living. Don't parade around like you're senor importante asking for room-temperature water and demanding a special pillow for your dog. Get a hold of yourself."

PAINTING SOLD UNDER NAZI DURESS RETURNED TO HEIRS OF OWNER

The Holocaust Claims Processing Office, a joint venture of the New York State banking and insurance departments, has announced the restitution of Madame La Suire, a painting by Albert von Keller, to the heirs of its original owner.

The HCPO discovered the painting at the Zürich Kunstgesellschaft in Switzerland. It is the fourth painting successfully restituted to the estate of Alfred Sommerguth with the assistance of the HCPO since 2008. Sommerguth sold it under duress at an auction in Berlin in 1939.

A director and co-owner of the tobacco company Loeser & Wolff, Sommerguth was also the head of city planning in Berlin when the Nazis came to power. In the late 1930s, he was forced to register all of his assets with Nazi authorities including his art collection of 106 assorted Renaissance masterpieces and impressionist works. Evading internment at a concentration camp, he fled Germany to Cuba in 1941 and eventually moved to New York, where he died in 1950.

Sommerguth's heirs have donated the painting to the Zurich gallery where it was found. To date, the HCPO has helped return more than $157 million in assets to victims' families while also retrieving 56 works of art for them, 40 since 2006.

Project aims to put Holocaust-era theatre online

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Albert Moses, a Dutch Jew, considers himself one of the lucky few. Not only his parents, but all four grandparents, and even a great-grandparent, survived World War II.

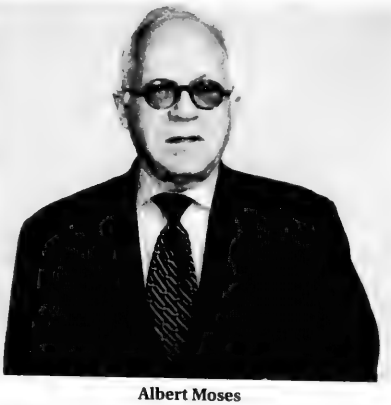
His mother and father met and married at war's end, and Moses was born in 1946.

Moses was consul general for the Netherlands in Montreal from 2002 to 2006. He and his wife, Simone, became so enchanted with the city and its Jewish community that they have decided to become permanent residents.

Moses retired from a 39-year career with the Netherlands' foreign service in April, after most recently serving as a representative to the Global Forum on Migration and Development.

With gratitude for his good fortune, Moses has undertaken voluntarily to be the representative in Canada of a new international Holocaust educational project. The aim is to track down and digitize content on theatre and other performing arts created by Jews during the Nazi era or otherwise related to the Holocaust.

The Holocaust On-Line Theatre Collection (HOTC) is being spearheaded by fellow Dutch Jew Mark Ejlenberg, a friend of Moses growing up in Amsterdam. After a successful banking career, Ejlenberg is now living in Israel.



Albert Moses

Veteran Israeli theatre director and producer Moti Sandak is the project's director and chief content editor.

He's already in charge of All About Jewish Theatre, a website promoting Jewish creativity generally in this art form.

HOTC is sponsored by the Conference of Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, and its offical launch is set for Jan. 20 in Berlin, in the House of the Wannsee Conference, the site of the 1942 meeting where the Nazi hierarchy planned the implementation of the "final solution" against the Jews. Today, it is a Holocaust memorial and museum.

Ejlenberg believes that the performing arts during the Holocaust will be a means of communicating to current and future generations in a way that at present is not being fully explored. The site will also preserve the memory of those who continued to express themselves through the arts despite the barbarity they lived through.

Such a collection would show, according to literature about the project, that "creativity and the human spirit cannot be destroyed," even in the darkest periods.

Major Jewish cultural and Holocaust remembrance organizations around the world are being approached for any contribution of material in their possession.

Cultural works created before, during or after the Holocaust are being considered.

Moses is contacting organizations in Montreal and elsewhere in Canada.

Equally, he is appealing to individuals who may have plays, music or films, or material such as posters about them, that would be suitable for inclusion.

"Even a snippet would be helpful," he said.

Moses said he's currently seeking to build interest in the project and is not fundraising.

He traces his family's history in Holland back at least 300 years. His grandparents and mother were all hidden by non-Jews during the Holocaust. His father, however, was rounded up three times and escaped. On his last flight, he made it to Spain via the Pyrenees Mountains, with the help of the Resistance.

He went to Britain and joined the Dutch Free Forces, which followed Canadian and American troops in the liberation of Holland. Moses' wife's family was not so fortunate. Only her parents, a sister and one cousin survived.

Today, Moses' 89-year-old mother lives in Israel. She has three sons, nine grandchildren and nine great-grandchildren scattered around the world.

He can be reached at 514-932-8076 or aemosenl@hotmail.com.

TORONTO JEWISH FILM FESTIVAL PRESENTS

18 VOICES OF KOL NIDRE

The Kol Nidre is Judaism's best known prayer, and yet also its least known. 18 Voices Sing Kol Nidre is the first documentary to tell its rich story. How did the Kol Nidre become a Jewish anthem and, as it turned out, an object of intense interest for non-Jews as well? 18 voices sing Kol Nidre, and 18 storytellers share their tales about the prayer with the help of unique visuals and a unique musical setting for the haunting melody. The 18 storytellers include a Hassidic rabbi, an African-American author, and a legal scholar. In addition, a film critic shows how the prayer burst onto the general pop scene with the first talking film, The Jazz Singer in 1927, and a composer demonstrates how the chant has reached beyond Jewish circles, adapted by non-Jewish musicians from Beethoven to Johnny Mathis to the Electric Prunes. In short, we learn the secrets of a sacred chant from those who have been deeply touched by it. With special guests: Director Allen Oren and Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

Historian delves into France's 'antisemitic moment'

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Shortly after Alfred Dreyfus – a Jewish artillery captain in the French army – was convicted of treason and exiled to Devil's Island, having been wrongly charged with spying for Germany, the eminent novelist Emile Zola wrote an impassioned open letter to France's president, Felix Faure.

Zola's cri de coeur, published in January 1898 on the front page of the newspaper L'Aurore under the provocative headline of J'Accuse, accused the civil and military authorities of obstruction of justice and antisemitism.

The celebrated missive was a major turning point in what evolved into the Dreyfus affair, a defining moment in 19th- and 20th-century France. Dreyfus' conviction, together with Zola's letter, unleashed a torrent of nationwide antisemitic violence, the likes of which France had not seen in centuries.

The violent campaign was launched by a coalition of disaffected right-wing nationalists and royalists. Although no one was killed, these pogrom-like disturbances sullied France's name and reputation as a nation of fraternity and equality.

"This antisemitic moment was subsequently erased from historical consciousness, eclipsed by the Dreyfus affair itself or, later, by the Vichy regime," writes French historian Pierre Birnbaum in a rigorously researched and fascinating book, The Antisemitic Moment: A Tour of France in 1898 (the University of Chicago Press). "It lay dormant, deep in unmined archives."

As Birnbaum explains, a great deal is known about Dreyfus' ordeal, but virtually nothing is known about the spasm of xenophobic anti-Jewish violence that washed over France in the aftermath of his conviction and Zola's poignant letter.

In this volume, Birnbaum – whose previous works include Antisemitism in France: A History from 1789 to the Present and Jewish Destinies: Citizenship, State and Community in Modern France – examines popular reactions in various French cities to Dreyfus' conviction.

He starts in Paris, the cosmopolitan capital, where mobs stormed through fashionable streets, beat on the doors of Jewish-owned shops, attempted to invade the residence of a member of the Rothschild family and attacked a Jewish factory, shattering hundreds of windowpanes and wounding one employee. Edouard Drumont, an antisemitic propagandist and the editor of La Libre Parole, lent his voice to this chorus of agitation.

In Lyon, students from a local Catholic school paraded down streets shouting, "Long live the army," "Down with the Jews!" and "Down with Zola!"

Meanwhile in Grenoble, a politician close to the Catholic Church condemned "the influence of the Jews over commerce, finance, the army and domestic and foreign policy."

An outfit known as the Antisemitic League of France spewed hatred in Nancy, warning of the "Jewish peril" and urging citizens to "unite against the Jew, a stranger to our race."

In Marseilles, agitators lashed out against Jews. A particularly comical scene unfolded in a brasserie when an antisemitic politician, having been challenged to prove he was not Jewish, displayed his genitals and thus committed an act of public indecency.

Calls for boycotts against Jewish stores resonated in Toulouse. Catholic and republican newspapers alike supported the boycott campaign. The 400 Jewish residents of Toulouse enjoyed relative calm, however. "Their possessions were not systematically destroyed," Birnbaum notes. "They escaped physical assault, and their synagogue and rabbi were by targeted by demonstrators."

Bordeaux, a symbol of the left, joined in the national frenzy, with Catholic and republican newspapers sniping at Jews. One newspaper commented, "Spain got rid of the Jews in 1492, then the Jews of Portugal arrived in Bordeaux. They are as faithful to their beliefs as the day they arrived."

Alfred Dreyfus

Emile Zola

Birnbaum claims that antisemitic animosity manifested itself most strongly in Nantes, where an association of shopkeepers openly called for a boycott of Jewish shop owners and where the inscription "Death to the Jews" was scrawled on Jewish storefronts. In addition to the boycott, photographers were placed next to Jewish stores to discourage potential customers.

Dieppe – the site of a disastrous Canadian army commando raid during World War II – experienced "very intense" antisemitic unrest. A group of students, joined by more than 1,000 onlookers, marched down the main thoroughfare chanting "Out with Zola," "Long live the army" and "Down with the Jews," and damaging a clothing store run by a Jew.

The local press published the ravings and rantings of two politicians. The first one urged readers to "steel your hearts against financial cosmopolitanism," code words for Jews. The second one wrote, "Teach the Jews that they are not your masters…"

According to Birnbaum, the police played an ambivalent role during this crisis. As he puts it, "They, too, were prone to prejudice, capable of participating in the abuse even while defending those assaulted by the nationalists." He adds, "To say that the police did not always seem zealous in apprehending those responsible for the violence is an understatement… As in theatrical plays, the police always arrived too late. The slow reaction of the forces of law and order, who always appeared after the party responsible for the crime had departed, is astonishing."

Birnbaum criticizes the police for underestimating the severity of the attacks: "It is equally astounding to note the incredible leniency of the police superintendents who, in report after report, maintained that a particular antisemitic act was 'an incident' and was in the end 'nothing serious worth noting.'"

Offenders who were arrested were charged not with striking Jews or looting their property but with "refusing to move along" or assaulting police officers, Birnbaum says.

Nonetheless, he credits the police with limiting the damage. "Here and there, they rushed to the aid of people being threatened, and their presence kept demonstrators from sacking stores and setting fire to synagogues."

In the final analysis, he concludes, the violence in France was not comparable to pogroms that had erupted in eastern Europe. Mayors and police forces checked, broke up or diverted antisemitic violence. And the federal government, he writes without elaboration, "showed few signs of weakness."

But, as Birnbaum would probably agree, the riots of 1898 were merely a foretaste of the brutal manner in which the fascist Vichy regime treated Jews after France's defeat and occupation in 1940.

Maccabi soccer team hoping to upset Latin powerhouses

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Maccabi Canada is sending a men's soccer team to take on the South American powerhouses at the Pan Am Maccabi Games – and they're expecting to come home with a medal.

Although Canada is not known for its soccer prowess at any level, team manager Shane Spring believes the Canadians have enough talent to pull an upset over their Latin cousins.

"I think we've got a very competitive team, and we stand a very good chance of surprising the Brazilians and the South Americans generally. We could come home with a medal," he said.

The games will be played in Sao Paulo over the winter holidays, and given that it's in South America, soccer is the Games' prestige event, Spring said. Thirteen teams will take part, including host Brazil, Argentina, Uruguay, Venezuela, Panama, Mexico, the United States, Peru, Chile, South Africa, Israel and Australia.

All games will be held at the training facilities of first division team Sao Paulo FC.

"Going to South America, one of the birthplaces for football [soccer], will be an exciting time," Spring said. "The players are excited about this competition."

As many as 18 players will suit up for Canada, including Spring's son, Oliver. Only 15, Oliver has already tasted international competition as a member of the under-16 Canadian team at the 2009 Maccabiah Games in Israel. Canada sent six teams to that event, with the girls under-18 team winning gold.

Oliver plays in the Canadian Soccer League reserve division and has travelled to Holland to work out with Feyenoord's youth academy, considered one of Europe's best.

Other prominent players for Canada are Tomer Chencinski, a keeper who plays professionally in Finland's first division; Bradley Rose, a member of the Canadian team at the 2009 Maccabiah who played NCAA football at Yale for three years; and York University players Ilya Orlov and Alon Badat.

Patrice Gheisar, who coaches SC Toronto Reserve and the York University Lions, will coach the team.

Players were recruited at an open tryout earlier this summer and through word of mouth, Spring said.

Spring, who is in real estate development, got involved with soccer through his children. He helped put together the boys under-16 team at the last Maccabiah, when it appeared they would not be included, and now he's molding the current team to form the nucleus of the Canadian entry at the 2013 Maccabiah.

The Maccabiah Games are a great experience that forges long-lasting bonds between young athletes and Israel, he said, while creating lifelong friendships with other Jews from around the world.

Altogether 90 athletes will represent Canada at the Pan Am Maccabi Games. Along with coaches, medical personnel and supporters, the contingent will reach about 150, said Alex Brainis, chair of Maccabi Canada's national athletic committee.

In addition to soccer, four men's basketball teams will compete in the masters 35-plus, open, under-19 and under-17 age groups, and two men's softball teams will participate in masters and open categories, while two individual athletes in tennis and table tennis round out the contingent.

Montrealer, 75, wins bronze at international triathlon

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Montrealer Morris Shore, 75, won a bronze medal at the International Triathlon Union World Championship in Beijing, China, on Sept. 11.

Shore, the oldest member of the Canadian team participating in the Olympic-distance competition, was entered in the 75-79 men's age category.

His time was 4:10:36, putting him in third place behind Americans John Cook (3:50:13) and Dieter Heycke (3:56:00), who are both 76.

Although Shore considers the 1.5-km swim to be his weakest element, he actually beat Cook and was only four seconds behind Heycke. Shore was close to the top two finishers in the 40-km bicycle ride, but performed below his expectations in his strongest suit, the 10-km run, clocking 1:32:38, more than 20 minutes behind Cook.

It was the same course used in the 2008 Olympic Games.

Shore used his participation to raise funds for the Snowdon YM-YWHA, where he trains, and he collected over $20,000.

"What a fantastic experience," said Shore, who stayed on for a week more in China. "It was such a privilege to be invited to participate. This isn't a local show. It's the international championships and the world's best triathletes were there, so I was happy just to compete in their company.

"To have received a bronze medal, as a member of the Canadian team is a tremendous honour I'll never forget."

Beaufort director makes film about father-son rivalry

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

For Israeli movie director Joseph Cedar, life and art intersect.

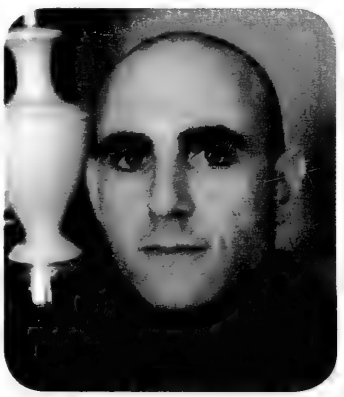
An Academy Award nominee and a Cannes Film Festival winner, he chooses topics likely to add value and meaning to his own life.

It would be "a waste of time" not to follow this formula, said Cedar, who presented his newest movie, Footnote, at the Toronto International Film Festival last week.

An unusual and emotionally charged drama about a father and son rivalry set in the closeted Talmud department of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Footnote is anything but a mainstream movie, at least in terms of its broad topic, bitter academic jealousies, and its characters, eccentric scholars.

Cedar, an observant Jew, readily admitted that Footnote, due to open in Toronto in the winter of 2012, delves into terrain that the average moviegoer would probably consider obscure.

"But I won't apologize for it," he said in an interview. "I felt I had discovered a sacred world of dramatic rivalries touching on some of the most relevant aspects of my life."



Joseph Cedar

Asked what these might be, he replied, "The search for truth. The importance of the written word. The need for recognition."

He added, "I find myself battling for these things daily."

Since the launch of his career in 2000, Cedar, 43, has tried to explore themes to which he can relate personally.

He made his debut by directing Time of Favour, a psychological thriller that takes place in the West Bank and is layered by a love triangle. Cedar – a graduate of Hebrew U (philosophy and theatre) and New York University (cinema studies) – wrote the script only after he had lived on the Jewish settlement of Dolev, near Ramallah.

Although Time of Favour generally garnered mixed reviews, it won five prizes, including best movie, from the Israeli Film Academy.

Cedar's next film, Campfire, released in 2004, unfolded on the West Bank as well and was about a young observant widow and mother who seeks to join a new settlement. It, too, was a critical success.

Beaufort, his third movie, came out several years later and focused on an Israeli army unit stationed in southern Lebanon in 2000, on the eve of Israel's unilateral withdrawal from that country.

To Cedar, who served as a paratrooper in the Israeli army from 1986 to 1989, Lebanon was hardly an alien place. Altogether, he spent nine months there, assigned to guard duty in Beaufort and a succession of fortresses that were regularly attacked by Hezbollah.

"Lebanon was part of my past and is extremely relevant to my life," he explained. "Beaufort captured fears and feelings, though not necessarily occurrences, I experienced."

Acclaimed by critics in Israel and abroad, it was one of Israel's greatest box office hits. Beaufort was also the first Israeli movie in decades to be selected as an Oscar nominee in the best foreign film category.

Cedar, who supported Israel's pullout from Lebanon, shot Beaufort on the Golan Heights, finishing it only a month before the outbreak of the Second Lebanon War in 2006.

Footnote, he said, was remotely based on "something that almost happened to me." The finished film, however, was far more complex, owing its inspiration to stories he had heard about the intense rivalries within the Hebrew University's Talmud department.

Cedar was genuinely surprised to learn he had won the best screenplay prize at this year's Cannes Film Festival. So surprised, in fact, that he returned to his home in Tel Aviv before the official announcement was even made. "You don't expect to win, but you hope you will."

While Cedar is hopeful that recognition at Cannes will enhance his career, he realizes that his future films will have to be sufficiently interesting to attract investor funds. "This is an industry that requires someone to give you a lot of money to tell a story," he said.

Born and partially raised in New York, Cedar and his family immigrated to Israel shortly after the 1973 Yom Kippur War, when he was six years old.

"My parents left a safe, familiar environment for a new world in Israel. It was a very big leap."

The son of Howard (Haim) Cedar, an Israel Prize recipient in biology, he was brought up in a traditional Jewish home, where the Sabbath and the laws of kashruth were scrupulously observed,

Cedar describes himself as an observant rather than an Orthodox Jew. "I'm connected to Orthodox Judaism in a tribal way, but it doesn't necessarily define me," said Cedar, who sometimes wears a yarmulke and calls himself flexible and tolerant on major political and social issues.

Flexibility and tolerance, he noted, are more important to him than blind obedience.

Drawn to the arts while still in high school, Cedar decided to study theatre and film after completing his military service. "I knew that's where I would be comfortable. I wanted to do something I'd be good at. I thought I had the sensibility that would work well with movies. But it was very hard getting started."

As a scriptwriter and director, Cedar is interested in exploring flawed characters. "A human flaw brings me closer to a character."

Rather than being judgmental of the characters he creates, he tends to be in sympathy with them.

And in Footnote, where the main protagonists are equally and radically flawed, Cedar has a field day in probing campus machinations, the complexity of pride and the lives of two men, father and son, whose personal styles could not be more different.

Comedian mixes it up with Jewish singles

Ari Teman

Riva Gold
Special to The CJN

Ari Teman is a comedian, entrepreneur, author and designer.

And when he comes to Toronto this week to host a Jewish singles mixer, he has some advice for those in attendance: lower your expectations.

"Oh, and stop bragging about Canada," he quips. "It makes you seem insecure."

He may only be 28, but Teman is already one of the most successful Jewish comedians in North America, making regular appearances at top comedy clubs and winning TimeOut New York's Joke of the Week.

On Sept. 25, Teman will be hosting the Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation's Night of Kosher Comedy in his first trip to Toronto.

"I'm very excited to visit," he says. "But maybe ease off on the moose in your imagery. You can't say you're an exciting place to visit if you've got a single leaf as your icon, either. Not even a whole pile of leaves, or a tree, really?"

Teman says he was raised in a modern Orthodox family in the Holy Land: Teaneck, N.J.

His dog, Sheyna, quickly learned the difference between "kosher" and "treif"– though Teman says she was not particularly strict about cholov Yisrael.

At the age of three or four, Teman decided he wanted to become Michael Jackson, an aspiration he says was ironic, because Michael Jackson wanted to be three or four. But soon after, the young Hebrew-school-hopper turned his attention to standup comedy.

The key to comedy, he says, is to "try to be funny." And it seems Teman has mastered that formula so far, because not only has he won awards and played to sold-out crowds across the country, he also earned the approval of U.S. President Barack Obama.

"I told Obama a joke at the White House Chanukah party," he says. "He cracked up. Then he hugged me. I did not even ask him to."

Teman says the Chanukah party had "a lot of Jews" and a White House-shaped cake that was too treasonous to eat.

So is he still observant? "No," Teman says. "I see different things." Teman says he'd describe himself as more "traditional," but every place has different labels. "In Brooklyn, what I'm called is 'heretic.' Depends where in Brooklyn though – sometimes they'll use the Hebrew or Yiddish word for it."

Now, Teman is working on a BBC documentary about Jews and the history of comedy with the English writer, actor and comedian Stephen Fry.

"In the Deep South, there's a lot of bias against Jews. But people like a Jew. We're popular on TV," he says.

Teman is something of an expert on the subject, having performed at Yeshiva University and attended Brandeis University (which he calls a "failed attempt to escape the Jewish environment").

"I talk to a lot of Jews," he says. "It's always tricky because Jews like to talk back."

Asked what he thinks of Canadian audiences, Teman says, "They have health care and can read and understand English." He warns, though, that he's never actually performed in Canada before. "Only Montreal," he says.

But Teman is not all fun and games, and has been acclaimed for his volunteer work and entrepreneurship. In 2006, he founded a large, international Jewish volunteer organization called JCorps.

"It's about group volunteering, and getting the young Jews aged 18 to 28 together to do something good," he says. "We make it convenient, fun, social. And we throw in a T-shirt!"

JCorps uses social media to unite volunteers for a wide variety of projects, including work in soup kitchens, seniors centres, children's hospitals, animal shelters, youth tutoring and urban renewal projects. In its first five years, JCorps has engaged nearly 10,000 volunteers from 180 schools and 600 companies. JCorps opened a branch in Montreal last year and may soon expand into Toronto.

On top of this, Teman founded NextGen: Charity and NextGen: Health conferences, which bring leaders in the fields of charity work and health care to give talks.

So how did he come up with so many clever ideas?

"I was sitting and having some shawarma with my friend Jonah, and as everyone knows, shawarma, it's a magical thinking elixir – it's the aphrodisiac of the intellectual mind, the juice of the intellect. Which is why I think Israel is such an innovative country," he says.

"So while we were eating, we thought about bringing in leaders in efficiency and innovation and put them up on stage."

The same year, Teman was named the Jewish Community Hero of the Year by the Jewish Federations of North America for his philanthropy and innovation.

"I beat a man who gave away a kidney. I felt good about that," he jokes.

And on top of it all, the young funnyman also invented GatherGrid, a grid system that polls people about the best time to plan an event, and wrote a book called Effective Gratitude for Organizations and Individuals after completing his degree in psychology and studio arts from Brandeis.

"Basically, the idea is that people who grow through regular exercise in gratitude are markedly happier and their social outlook is healthier. So I tried to go through ways groups and teams can focus on that to solve problems – it's just a way of harnessing that positive mindset," he explains.

But Teman is already looking to the future and focusing on new projects. Today, he's building a new social hub called JSuite for young Jews in New York's Union Square. But his real goal, he says, is to open a car design company. "Who needs people when you've got cars?"

All together, each alone

Dear Ella,

The Jewish New Year was always a nice time in our home. Memories of wonderful smells filled the house, and there was a sort of bustle that surrounded the dinners on those nights. Dad would have to set up the large dining table, and my sister and I were in charge of polishing the silverware and setting the table with the good china.

When I was younger, I actually went to shul with my parents, too, but did little praying. Instead, my friends and I ran through the corridors of the synagogue and often got in trouble for making too much noise. But the awe of hearing the shofar was always the highlight. It was a very special memory that fills me with warmth.

Then my parents separated and the entire mood in the house changed. My sister and I stayed with our mom. At first, she tried not to involve us in their fighting, but eventually, the venom spewed and the hatred was evident. Our first Rosh Hashanah as a split family was nothing short of torture. They fought over us and forced us to choose. I'm thankful that I'm now away in school and can make excuses for not coming home. I actually dread the High Holidays now and feel very lonely. I wanted to share my story in case any of your other readers feel this way, too.

Alone for the holidays

Dear Alone for the holidays,

I can hear in your letter the longing for those days that have left their mark in your heart. It's time, however, to make new memories to carry with you. Rosh Hashanah is a time for self-reflection. However, when you do it together with others as part of a community or group, you're given guidance and a sort of "program" to follow. The warmth you're looking for is still there, it just has to come from within.

I'm sure that if you try, you'll find other young Jewish students that are alone at school during the holidays. Perhaps there is a Hillel at the school, or a Chabad, or another congregation nearby. You don't have to know anyone there. You'll meet new people. I think you'll be surprised to see that your situation isn't so unique and that many people, for one reason or another, are alone for the holidays.

All of us together, each of us alone. The High Holidays are a time when all of us stand alone before God as we reflect on our lives and review our past year. But whether you realize it or not, you're part of a much larger Jewish community. Don't go it alone. Go to a place where, once again, you can hear the shofar. It may bring back memories, but at the same time, you'll be making a new connection, one you'll carry with you through adulthood, a new memory that's yours alone, not one from your past.

The memories you shared with your family will always live on in a special corner of your heart, but you have room for many more special moments. Find your own compass and follow it in other directions. Embrace the new community you're part of. Don't sit alone in your dorm room listening to the shofar on YouTube. Go online and find a service nearby. Who knows what's waiting for you.

Shanah Tovah.

Musical memories: part of one's soul

It was a very special two nights: the piano concerto component of the 13th Arthur Rubinstein International Piano Master Competition in Tel Aviv.

My wife and I had decided on this special trip not long after she returned three years previously from the 12th annual event, overwhelmed by its excitement and the quality of the competitors. I decided that for the 13th event, which took place this past May, I would make sure I could take the time off for the whole festival, a total of three weeks that included 24 concerts, with the elimination of the first 16 of 32 contestants and then down to six finalists.

The last four concerts were moved from a more intimate concert venue at the Tel Aviv Museum of Art to the Mann Auditorium, where on the last two nights the Israel Philharmonic accompanied the pianists in their major piano concertos. It was magical; six young aspiring but already very accomplished pianists from Japan, the United States, Israel and Russia displayed their musicianship and virtuosity to an enthusiastic and receptive audience that thrived on their music and repaid their performances with heartwarming applause and "bravos."

It was these final two concerts that had the greatest effect on me by bringing up precious musical memory associations. The first was when one of the Russian finalists played the well-known and powerful Tchaikovsky's First Piano Concerto. I recall as a 17-year-old listening late at night to the New York Times radio station WQXR and hearing a broadcast recording of Van Cliburn's momentous win of the first International Tchaikovsky Competition held in Moscow in 1958 and hearing the crowd erupt in applause when he finished playing and when his name was announced as winner – an unbelievable achievement for a non-Russian at the height of the Cold War.

Senior Side of Life

Michael Gordon

The second Rubinstein competitor's piece that brought back poignant memories was the Japanese contestant whose rendition of Brahms' Second Piano Concerto stimulated deeply felt associations with a Norwegian medical student whom I adored while I was a medical intern in Aberdeen, Scotland. Although she could not return my affection, we shared music and would often curl up together before her fireplace and listen to the Brahms concerto, especially the slow third movement. The last letter I received from her some years after we parted was from a missionary hospital in Africa, where she decided to vest her professional and emotional energies and efforts.

The last association was the most profound. It was when the American finalist started with the crescendo of eight notes that herald the Rachmaninoff Second Piano Concerto. As the piece progressed through its inspiring melodic form, I recalled when I was 15 years old, my father hooking up the 45 RPM turntable to a large table radio and putting on the changer five red vinyl records recorded by Rubinstein with conductor Fritz Reiner and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra in 1956. I listened to that recording, with the pauses between the records as they automatically dropped into place on the changer, over and over again. It was not until a few years later that I got the first 33 RPM rendition of this piece, and it took me time to get used to listening to the music without the pauses of the five-disc format.

Music can elicit beautiful, sad, poignant and romantic associations. As we grow older, these musical associations may become more profound and meaningful and should be savoured as one of the great joys of life.
